VOLUME XXVI, PART IV.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

FIFTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

do not want to make any comparison on that line, but it seems to me that an expression of that sort is unparliamentary, unbecoming, and entirely out of place. That is parliamentary language, is it not? There is another set on that side of the House, radiating out from the gentleman from Maine——

A MEMBER. What do you mean by a "set"?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Well, another corps; that is better. The gentleman from Maine, when he rises to speak, stands over there, looks over to this side of the House and says: "Let us do this by the rules of common sense," all the time insisting that the Democratic side of this House are without knowledge on the subject. And then some smaller men will rise and say that we are ignorant on the Democratic side. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] made a discovery the other day. He found a decision of the Supreme Court that has been read in this House at least forty times. He had just discovered it, I presume; and he said the Democratic side was densely ignorant, and then he proceeded to read that decision of the Supreme Court, which had been frequently and ably discussed in the House, in order to inform this House what the Supreme Court had decided, and then remarked that gentlemen on the Democratic side seemed to be densely ignorant. And I must say that a number of gentlemen on this Democratic side of the House, when the gentleman from Maine tells them that, stand about him taking it all in, and laughing with an expression of great admiration on their face.

A MEMBER. How about Abram Hewitt?

Mr. STOCKDALE. Oh, I suppose the gentleman from Maine made a speech over there, and I suppose Hewitt caught the infection from the gentleman from Maine, and thought that as that gentleman had said something smart he would imitate.

Mr. REED. Probably both were pretty accurate.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I have no doubt the gentleman from Maine thinks so; and if he can succeed in getting a Democratic Speaker to count a quorum of this House his poor opinion of us would disappear; and then the gentleman from Maine would be enabled to decide a question which his mind has been poised upon for some time; and that is whether God made him or he made God. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, this provision which the gentleman from Illinois wants to strike out is clearly a reduction of the expenses of the Government and within the province of this committee.

Mr. SAYERS. I hope we shall now have a vote.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think this is a matter of so much importance that it ought to be a little more fully understood before the vote is taken.

The CHAIRMAN. No further debate is in order unless another amendment be offered.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee, who is in charge of this bill (because I was ill when the matter was considered in the full committee), whether the appointments in the Coast and Geodetic Survey are now made under civil-service rules?

Mr. SAYERS. I can not say whether they are or not.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not think there is any law governing that matter. I never heard of any law that governed the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. SAYERS. One hundred and thirty-eight persons are authorized to be employed; and the number who entered under the processes of the civil-service law for 1893 was 17.

Mr. DINGLEY. Only 17 were appointed under civil-service rules?

Mr. O'NEIL. Seventeen during the year 1893.

Mr. SAYERS. There were 17 out of the whole force, as I understand, who were appointed under civil-service rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. The question I have propounded will be recognized, I think, as an exceedingly important one in regard to the effect of this amendment.

If the effect of the amendment is practically to take from under the operation of civil service rules all these appointments—and they are now under civil-service rules except as to certain scientific appointments—the head of the Bureau and some others—of course its effect may be far-reaching. I should like to know definitely, and I think the Committee of the Whole would also like to understand the situation of the Coast and Geodetic Survey in this respect.

Mr. SAYERS. It was not the object of this clause to interfere with the civil-service law at all in this respect——

Mr. DINGLEY. I take it for granted it was not.

Mr. SAYERS. And if the gentleman has any apprehension as to the effect of this clause upon those who are employed in the Coast Survey under civil-service rules, I am perfectly willing that he should suggest an amendment which will remove all doubt upon the subject.

I wish to say further that, so far as I am concerned, my only object was to reduce the expenditures of the office force. I believe there are too many people there. For instance, the Blue Book shows that there were as many as 11 messengers employed at one time in that office. I thought that the Secretary of the Treasury, in connection with the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, might rearrange the force of this Bureau so as to reduce the cost $18,600. That was my only purpose.

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no doubt that the purpose of the chairman of the committee in this matter was exactly as he has stated; but my inquiry was as to what the effect might be; whether this legislation might not go much further than the chairman had intended it should go.

Mr. SAYERS. Would it not be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, in rearranging his force, to observe the civil-service rules?

Mr. DINGLEY. That was one of the inquiries I proposed to make.

Mr. SAYERS. I should think it would be.

Mr. DINGLEY. On having my attention called to this matter—for as I have stated, I was absent on account of illness when the bill was being considered by the full committee—I telephoned a few moments ago to the head of the Coast and Geodetic Survey asking how appointments are made; and I have this answer:

All the clerical force and most of the scientific are under civil service.

That is the response of the head of the Bureau. I wish to say that in my judgment no greater misfortune could befall a scientific department like this than legislation which would tend to take it out of the nonpartisan position which it has heretofore held and place it under any circumstances in such a position that these appointments should be made for partisan reasons.

Mr. ENLOE. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. ENLOE. In reference to the telephonic message which the gentleman has just received from the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, does the gentleman know whether or not the Civil Service Commission has ever held any examination——

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not.

Mr. ENLOE. For the establishment of any eligible list with reference to this Bureau; or does he know whether there have been appointments made in the Coast and Geodetic Survey under civil-service rules?

Mr. DINGLEY. I have no personal knowledge in the matter at all. The only information I have is contained in this answer to my telephonic inquiry.

Mr. ENLOE. My understanding is that the force over there has not been subject to civil-service rules; that the officers in charge have not been in the habit of consulting the Civil Service Commission as to who should be appointed or who should be removed. I think the gentleman will find upon investigation that the employés of that Bureau have not been under the protection of the civil-service law, and that no regard has been paid to that law in making changes there.

Mr. DOCKERY. I think there must be some mistake in the message which the gentleman from Maine has just read, because the document from which the chairman of the committee [Mr. SAYERS] has quoted is a report made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the joint commission under date of May 24 last, in which he states that at that time only 17 employés out of 138 were under civil-service rules. Now, if this report was correct, there must be some error in the statement which the gentleman from Maine has just read.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will say to the gentleman that while my telephone message was forwarded to Prof. Mendenhall, this answer is not signed by him, and it may have come from some other person in that office.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not wish to be misunderstood about this matter, or to misrepresent anything. I have no doubt but that the clerical force is under the civil-service rules, but I do not believe that any other portion of the force of that office is under the civil-service rules.

Mr. DINGLEY. This statement is that all the clerical force and most of the scientific are under the civil service.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not believe that.

Mr. DOCKERY. Their report to us is incorrect, if that is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. There was an understanding, Mr. Chairman, that when we reached any of these important points there should be an opportunity for more general debate.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine have ten minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I do not know that I shall occupy all of the ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Maine [Mr.

DINGLEY] be allowed to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. I simply desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that I am in entire harmony with any proposition to reduce the force in any of these bureaus or departments where it can be done without injury to the public service. Even the reduction that was made here I did not propose to antagonize, but my attention has been called to what might be the effect of this amendment with reference to the appointment of these officials, and I simply desire to satisfy myself, and I presume the committee desire to be satisfied, as to whether in this legislation we were changing in any manner the mode of appointment of these officials in the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. I will agree, and I suppose the committee will agree, that the gentleman may insert a proviso that nothing in this provision shall affect the operation of the civil-service law upon that Bureau as it now operates.

Mr. DINGLEY. A proviso of this kind:

Provided, That appointments in the Coast and Geodetic Survey shall be made under the civil-service rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That would be extending the civil-service law to this Bureau.

Mr. DINGLEY. I refer, of course, to those who come within the provisions of the law, whose salaries are between $900 and $1,800. I simply want to be sure that we apply the civil-service rules to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. ENLOE. I want to ask the gentleman if he contemplates, by the adoption of this amendment, if it should be adopted, that it will vacate all the positions in the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

Mr. DINGLEY. I am not certain about that.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not think it would. I think it would give power to reorganize, where not in conflict with the civil-service laws.

Mr. DINGLEY. I supposed that was the intention.

Mr. ENLOE. I think that is the effect of the amendment.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible to hear what gentlemen are saying. I ask that there may be order on the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. ENLOE. I do not think the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] wishes to incorporate anything into this legislation which would change the operations of the civil service law.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all.

Mr. ENLOE. Or which would place a construction upon this act that would require the Secretary, or even authorize him, to vacate all these offices.

Mr. DINGLEY. Not at all. I simply desire that, as to officers whose salaries bring them under the civil service rules, they shall be appointed under those rules. That is all I desire.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] would like to speak, and I ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] to allow him to address the committee while the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] prepares his amendment, and then he can consume the remainder of the time which has been accorded to him.

Mr. ENLOE. I ask the gentleman to yield to me a little time.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, what I desire to ask the attention of the committee to, is the language of the bill itself, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to reorganize that office by the reduction of the office force, by the reduction of the number or compensation, or both, of employés.

Under existing law the officials in any of the great Departments who have charge of matters of that kind can reduce a clerk from a $1,200 position to a $1,000 position; but there is no warrant in the law that would permit the party who has this authority, whether it be the Secretary of the Treasury or one of his subordinates, to make a $1,200 position into a $1,000 position. That can only be done by legislation.

Now, the obnoxious feature of this proposed legislation is this, that while there are some fifty or sixty positions under this bill with salaries ranging from $4,000 to $900, if this amendment of mine is voted down, and the bill as reported by the committee is adopted, it gives the Secretary of the Treasury the power of saying that a Government officer, who holds a position to-day where he draws a salary of $3,000 and has drawn that salary for a number of years, must perform all the duties of that office for $2,000; and that a person who holds a position under existing law, and draws a salary of $1,500, must hereafter perform the duties of that office for $1,000.

This bill would permit the Secretary of the Treasury to say that the salary of $5,000, which has just been voted by this House to the Superintendent of this Bureau, can be reduced to $3,000. Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that no such power as that should be given to any executive officer of the Government.

When I used the word "coward," as I did, to which exception was taken by the gentleman from Mississippi, it was in connection with this: that if this House desire to reduce the salaries of any of these officers in that Bureau, it is within the province of the members here, by their votes, to make such reductions, and they should not shirk that responsibility by throwing it upon the Secretary of the Treasury in the manner proposed in the pending bill.

Now, I do not believe this legislation is constitutional. As I stated to the gentleman who was in the chair when I made the point of order, under the Constitution of the United States the legislative department of the Government is vested in the House and the Senate, and in no other branches of the Government. This legislation proposes to confer that power upon the Secretary of the Treasury; and I believe, if this should be adopted, and the Secretary of the Treasury should undertake to reorganize this Bureau as contemplated here in the language which I seek to have stricken from the bill, that it would be impossible for him to do it, and that any of these officers who are drawing the salaries voted to them to-day in this bill, by presenting their claims in the Court of Claims could collect their salaries from the Government, notwithstanding the action taken by the Secretary of the Treasury.

And I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if the Secretary of the Treasury should undertake to abolish any of these offices, such as the assistant superintendents, of whom there are a number drawing from two to four thousand dollars each, they would have the power to collect their salaries in the Court of Claims even if this language should be adopted, for the reasons that I have stated.

Now, with this staring us in the face, it seems to me that the proper and reasonable and sensible thing to do is for this House to determine just what shall be done in the reorganization of this Bureau. If, as the gentleman who is in charge of this bill states, there are eleven messengers and only five are needed, then cut off six of these messengers by only making appropriations for five; and if there are any other offices that are filled that are not necessary for the proper discharge of the duties assigned to that Bureau, then let the chairman of this Committee on Appropriations, who has apparently investigated this subject, indicate which of these offices can be abolished with benefit to the Government and a saving to the Treasury, and let the House take that responsibility.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I now offer an amendment, somewhat in the line suggested by the chairman of the committee [Mr. SAYERS], to come in on page 23, line 4, to be inserted after the word "ninety-five."

Mr. ENLOE. I reserve all points of order on that amendment until I hear it read.

The amendment offered by Mr. DINGLEY was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "ninety-five," in line 4, on page 23, the following: "Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to affect the civil-service rules now applicable to the Coast and Geodetic Survey."

Mr. ENLOE. I shall make a point of order on that unless the gentleman modifies it so as to read "in so far as now applicable."

Mr. DINGLEY. That is just what it says. I have shown my amendment to the chairman of the committee. It simply preserves the existing status of things with reference to the civil-service laws.

Mr. ENLOE. I understood it to read "now applicable." I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. ENLOE. I insist that the amendment should read "in so far as now applicable." I do not propose to admit that they are applicable. I do not know whether they are or not.

Mr. DINGLEY. There is no objection to that. That does not change the meaning.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Does the amendment contemplate, if this bill passes, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to reduce this force; that if he shall find an entirely competent employé who is not under the civil-service rules, and one who is incompetent, who is under the civil-service rules, that he shall be required to retain the incompetent man and discharge the competent one?

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no; the gentleman is well aware that under the civil-service rules the head of a Department may remove.

Mr. STOCKDALE. He can do it for cause; but where there is a reduction of the force, can he remove employés who are under the civil-service rules, under that amendment?

Mr. DINGLEY. If the force is not needed, there is no restriction under the civil-service rules.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I understand removals must be for cause.

Mr. ENLOE. This will be cause enough, if it passes.

Mr. STOCKDALE. If the effect of this would be as I have suggested, then I would be in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS].

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has just offered, demonstrates to the House the unwisdom of its course this morning in voting down an amendment which directed an investigation into the workings of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Here are gentlemen coming up on all sides and confessing that they are absolutely ignorant of the rules and laws that govern the existence of this Coast and Geodetic Survey.

It is one of those sacred institutions that has grown up under the Government, one that is clothed about as with a garment of sanctity and science; and whenever you talk to a member of Congress about science, he immediately retreats, because he is afraid he will be entrapped into a position where his ignorance on the subject will be demonstrated; and, therefore, rather than know anything about it, he will shut his eyes and close his ears and refuse to hear or to know anything in regard to a scientific bureau.

There is not another bureau of this Government with reference to which there are not some members on this floor who can get up here and tell you all about its operations.

Here is a Bureau about which there is such dense ignorance that no member can be found who is rash enough to attempt to say what law governs it.

The Committee on Appropriations confessedly knows nothing about it. This committee is trying to cut the appropriation in the dark. The Superintendent would not enlighten them, and the House refuses to turn on the light, so we are all in the dark as to details; and now the committee wants to shift the responsibility of investigation and reorganization to the Secretary of the Treasury.

When it comes to this Bureau, no gentleman on this floor can tell you what law governs it.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. It is the Treasury Department rules of 1886 which govern this Bureau, as signed by the Secretary of the Treasury and approved by the President.

Mr. ENLOE. I understand it is under the control of the Treasury Department, but I understand furthermore that the Secretary of the Treasury has heretofore, in dealing with this Bureau, been just about as impotent as Congress has been, and frequently as ignorant.

To illustrate what a fraud it is, I will say that since this Administration came into power naval officers have been denied the credit in the maps for the work they did. The Coast Survey not only denied the credit to the naval officers for the work they did, but they impudently placed on the maps or charts the work to the credit of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. The charts appeared to be the work of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and not the work of the naval officers who performed it.

The naval officers objected to this, and the Secretary of the Navy protested to the Secretary of the Treasury against this fraud, and the Secretary of the Treasury made an order that the rule heretofore governing in that Bureau should still control in the printing of the maps, and the credit for the work should be given to the naval officers who did the work, and not to this fraudulent Coast Survey, which did not do the work, but which was attempting to usurp the credit for it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Chairman, I have the floor, I believe.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I beg pardon. I thought the gentleman had concluded.

Mr. ENLOE. I have not quite concluded. I understand that not only was all this work that gentlemen talk about here done by the Navy during the last year, or nearly the entire hydrographic work, but I understand that 35 per cent of the officers of the line in the Navy have served in this Coast and Geodetic Survey and are familiar with this work.

They are the men who are doing it to-day, and they are the men who ought to be authorized by law to do it. Instead of making an appropriation to the Coast Survey, with the pretense that it does the work, and at the same time devolving the work on the naval officers, and taking a portion of the appropriation of the Navy Department to do it with, we ought to go at it directly and place it where it properly belongs, under the control of the Navy Department. I regret exceedingly that there should be any institution in this Government that can so hedge itself about, either with the fear of gentlemen that they may expose their ignorance if they inquire into it, or with its patronage, or in any other way, that the House of Representatives will vote down a proposition to investigate the methods of its operation.

The work on the Coast Pilot is done by naval officers. The hydrographic work is done by naval officers. The topographic work along the shore has been done as well and can be done as well by naval officers. The Coast Survey work in every civilized country in the world except the United States and Portugal is done by naval officers. Our naval officers do this work on all foreign coasts. Annapolis and Annapolis is turning out young men every year ready for this work. The Coast and Geodetic Survey has won this fight to-day, but this is not the end of it. It must go to the Navy Department where it belongs, and it will go there before this fight is ended. I expect to renew it next year and every year while I remain in Congress until this reform is accomplished.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, so far I have taken no part in the discussion touching the appropriation for the Coast and Geodetic Survey. I do not know that I should do so now, yet I will say a word.

I have discovered, in the making of this bill, and in the temper that was displayed toward the Coast Survey, especially in the Committee of the Whole, and generally in the atmosphere, that there was an intention upon the part of some gentlemen of the powers that be to reorganize this Survey. One step looking toward the reorganization was the reduction of the salary of the head of this Bureau from $6,000 to $5,000.

I know the head of this Bureau slightly, having come in contact with him when this bill was prepared during the Fifty-first Congress, and after there had been some unfortunate scandals, and perhaps some reason therefor, some years prior to that time, in this Bureau. But for a long time the salary has been $6,000, and I have not any doubt that it ought to be $6,000 for anybody who is competent to be at the head of this Bureau. The present head of the Bureau made the impression upon me that he is competent to fill the position.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. If this language which I seek to have stricken from the bill by the House should be adopted, is it not in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to still further reduce his salary from $5,000 to $3,000?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I suppose so. But I discovered as I thought a tendency to place this important Bureau, which is chiefly instrumental in making surveys of the coast, in making charts, and doing work that is important to the lives and property of our people engaged in the commerce and navigation of our country, and that certain expenses were——

Mr. STOCKDALE. I would like to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me finish this sentence. I thought we discovered a tendency to take this Bureau, which ought to be a competent and scientific Bureau, and make it a mere political appendix; and from that standpoint $6,000 is too much for the head of the Bureau; $5,000 is too much if a mere politician is going to be at the head of the Bureau. If the head of the Bureau is not to be one competent for this work, I think $2,500 would be enough. So that if this policy is to be pursued toward this Bureau, why then let them bring it down to the compensation that somebody should have who simply seeks a place. In my judgment, if the Bureau is not properly organized and properly conducted, with the best possible material to do this work necessary for the protection of the lives of our people and the commerce of our country, not only of our Navy, but of the merchant marine also, then I would be glad to see it properly organized. In my judgment, the Bureau is doing pretty good work, and I think we should let it alone. But if the enemies of the Bureau are to have their way and the real efficiency of the Bureau is to be impaired, then cut it all you please and make it as cheap as you can; and if you cut the salaries down to not more than $800 or $1,000 a year each, you will not do more than you ought.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, an amendment was proposed the other day by the gentleman from Indiana to the general appropriation bill which is solely new legislation, and which the gentleman himself admitted was subject to the point of order. That amendment was proposed to the act of March 3, 1891, to the provision of which I invite the attention of the committee:

All entries under the preemption, homestead, desert-land, or timber-culture laws, in which final proof and payment may have been made and certificate issued, and to which there are no adverse claims originating prior to final entry and which have been sold or incumbered prior to the 1st day of March, 1888, and after final entry, to bona fide purchasers or incumbrancers, for a valuable consideration, shall, unless upon an investigation by a Government agent, fraud on the part of the purchaser has been found, be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Land Department of such sale or incumbrance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, under that law I wish to state to this House a very large number of claims have been made in which the parties have received their final receipts, and there are a great number of these claims that have passed to innocent third purchasers. A great many of these claims have had money loaned upon them, upon the faith of that law, which is now sought to be amended; and the effect of which amendment will be to absolutely disturb, unsettle, and overturn the titles of hundreds and thousands of pieces of property in this country. I refer particularly to the town site of Great Falls, in the State from which I hail. Now, Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] brings in on an appropriation bill:

Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in its provisions to or affect any case where a contest was pending in the Land Department prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, and any person who initiated contest prior thereto shall have the right, upon cancellation of the prior entry, if by virtue of his contest, to enter the tract involved under any of the land laws of the United States in force prior to the date of this act, if he was on March 3, 1891, legally qualified to make such entry, and as if said act had not been passed.

The effect of that amendment, Mr. Chairman, is simply this, that where final receipts have been given and the certificates issued for them where the parties have placed improvements upon them, where they have been sold to bona fide third purchasers for value, where money has been loaned upon the strength of their title, which is conferred in this act, all these titles will be unsettled; and in this very case that I refer to, and in the case of Jasper, in the State of Minnesota, there are land-grabbers standing ready to take them, and one of them is a man who has just been released from the penitentiary for land frauds.

The purpose is to give possession of these lands, held by these parties in good faith, by initiating a contest under the provisions of this amendment. I do not know for what purpose it was done, or what inspired the introduction of that amendment in an appropriation bill. I make no reflection upon the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, for whom I have a great regard; but certainly to change the land legislation on an appropriation bill is highly inappropriate to the subject-matter contained in the bill.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, I desire very briefly to call the attention of the committee to something which was not presented to this committee, and which we had the right to have presented to us in the consideration of that amendment. I want to say, furthermore, that had I known that this amendment was to be presented, I would have raised the point of order, or had it raised by some friend. I invite the attention of the committee to a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, bearing date December 14, 1893, and a leater of the Secretary of the Interior, bearing date of December 15, 1893, in which those officers absolutely report against these two bills which contain substantially the provision contained in this amendment. Here are the letters, and with the permission of the committee, I will read them.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1893.

The Honorable the Secretary of the Interior:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by your reference, for report thereon in duplicate of House bill No. 4458, present session, entitled "A bill to amend section 7 of 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," which bill was transmitted to you by the honorable the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives, "with the request that you give * * * your opinion as to the propriety of passing the same, and inform the committee of the number of cases that would be covered by the amendment."

It is stated further in the letter transmitting the said bill that "the mover of it (Judge HOLMAN) introduced during the last session bill H. R. 3373 upon the same subject, but desires to insist upon the 4458 instead of that," and the desire is expressed that "you will consider the two together."

In regard to H. R. 3373, last session, the same is also now before me by your reference for similar report, having previously been sent to you for report thereon by the chairman of the House Committee on Public Lands.

Considering the two bills together which have been referred, the intention of both appears to be to conserve or effectuate the preference rights of contestants under the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat., 140), so far as the same is or may be adversely affected by anything contained in the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1891, or by any legal construction thereof.

As to this purpose of the two bills it is respectfully submitted whether a law can now be enacted which would defeat a confirmation and right to patent previously accruing to the entryman under the act of March 3, 1891, as held by the Department. (See 12 L. D., 571, Gerlach v. Kindler; 13 L. D., 292, Axford v. Shanks; 16 L. D., 46, Nawrath v. Lyons et al.; 16 L. D., 78, United States v. Bullen.) I am of opinion that if either of the bills proposed should become a law, the effect would be an attempt to defeat rights already confirmed under the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1891. In that view, I find the proposed legislation objectionable, and recommend that neither bill be enacted into law.

All papers are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 15, 1893.

SIR: I transmit herewith report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office on House bill 3373, "declaring the construction of an act named therein," and House bill 4458 "to amend section 7 of An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891," which was referred to be considered in connection with the first-mentioned bill.

These two bills accomplish, substantially, the same purpose, which is to declare that nothing in section 7 of the act of March 3, 1891, shall be construed to apply in its provisions or to affect any case where a contest is pending in the Land Department prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, and that any person who initiated a contest prior thereto shall have the right, upon cancellation of the prior entry, by virtue of his contest, to enter the tract involved under any of the land laws of the United States prior to the date of said act of March 3, 1891, if he was legally qualified to make said entry, as if said act had not been passed.

The practical effect of the bills is to declare that a contestant is an adverse claimant within the meaning of the 7th section of the act of March 3, 1891. Said section provides as follows:

"All entries under the preëmption, homestead, desert-land, or timber-culture laws, in which final proof or payment may have been made and certificate issued, and to which there are no adverse claims originating prior to final entry and which have been sold or incumbered prior to the 1st day of March, 1888, and after final entry, to bona fide purchasers or incumbrancers, for a valuable consideration, shall, unless upon an investigation by a Government agent, fraud on the part of the purchaser has been found, be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Land Department of such sale or incumbrance."

In construing this section, it has been uniformly held by the Department that a mere contest pending against an entry at the date of the act of March 3, 1891, where no priority is claimed, or any other right, except the preference right of entry that may be secured by the successful prosecution of the contest, is not such an adverse claim originating prior to final entry as will defeat the confirmation of the entry, where the land has been sold or incumbered prior to the 1st day of March, 1888, and after final entry to bona fide purchasers or incumbrancers, for a valuable consideration, and where no fraud has been found on the part of the purchaser.

Under this ruling a large number of cases have been held to be confirmed under the provisions of said act and have been patented. If the ruling of the Department is the true construction of the act, the cases that are subject to confirmation would not, in my judgment, be affected by the proposed legislation, which would be merely an attempt to defeat rights already confirmed under said section.

I therefore concur in the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the bill be not passed.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. THOMAS C. MCRAE,
Chairman of Committee on Public Lands, House of Representatives.

During the reading of the foregoing the time of Mr. HARTMAN expired.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to strike out the last word of the pending section.

Mr. SAYERS. I suppose all the gentleman desires to do is to put those letters in the RECORD.

Mr. HARTMAN. I should like to have the letter go into the RECORD; and I wish to state before I take my seat that the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior absolutely repudiate these provisions which were presented the other day in the form of this amendment. I think that the committee is entitled to know that it has the condemnation of those officers.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask that the time of the gentleman be extended for five minutes.

Mr. WISE. I object.

Mr. HARTMAN. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not recognize the gentleman on that motion.

Mr. HARTMAN. I ask that the remainder of the letters may be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I rise to indorse the position of my friend from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN]. In the five minutes allowed me I have only time to suggest a few considerations which I must be satisfied not to elaborate.

The avowed purpose of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is to correct an error, to right a wrong. The act sought to be amended was passed March 3, 1891. Had this amendment been proposed March 4, 1891, there would probably have been no objection to its passage. But now, more than three years later, the situation is different. It may have been a mistake not to include such a provision in the act on March 3, 1891, but to insert such an amendment now would be a much more serious mistake.

That act became operative immediately after its enactment. It was and is a statute of repose. Under this act large sums of money have in good faith been invested in land.

It is granted, Mr. Chairman, that there may be a conflict of equities in this matter. This being granted, the question for us to determine which of equities is the greater and what action is most in accord with good public policy. On the one hand we have the equity of the contestant, who frequently is a man whose only expenditure of time, money, or labor has been that necessary to pry into the record and find some technical defect in a title.

On the other hand, we have the equities of those who in good faith have put their money, as well as their time and talent, into the land and improvements. We must decide between equities that are merely prospective and those that are real and substantial.

As one illustration of the great wrong that may be done by the passage of this amendment, I cite the instance of the village of Jasper, in my district. The land upon which it stands contains valuable stone quarries. These have been developed at great expense. The men working in them have built their modest homes. Numerous places of business have been erected. The village has a bright future. With the law as it now stands all will be well.

But the addition of this amendment will bring a cloud over every home; and for whom and what? For a man who, as I understand it, has done nothing to build up the town, and whose only claim to recognition is the allegation that he has found somewhere back in the record a technical error or omission. By leaving the law as it is he loses nothing; while by passing the amendment we run the risk of taking away all the worldly possessions of people who, placing full faith in the records and decisions of this Government, have created the village of Jasper.

This illustration, Mr. Chairman, is, I take it, typical. And it seems to me that good public policy is against the amendment, and I trust that when the matter comes up in the House it will be defeated.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be considerable confusion and doubt as to the wisdom of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana. In his remarks when the amendment was up for consideration he stated that it was approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior. He understood at that time that it would apply only to contests that had been initiated, and that the repeal of the timber-culture act would leave those people in a condition that they could not avail themselves of timber-culture entries. He also understood that it would affect only about twenty-five entries. Now, if the fact is as it appears to be, that it will affect a large number of entries throughout our Western country, are we to have any opportunity to reconsider?

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be reconsidered. The only way will be to vote it down in the House.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then, Mr. Chairman, I give notice, if such notice is proper at this time, that when this proposition comes up in the House we shall ask for a separate vote upon it. I do not wish to detain the committee now, but this is a matter that ought to be looked into. If the gentleman from Indiana were present we might go on now and discuss it for ten or fifteen minutes and perhaps come to a conclusion about it, but as he is unavoidably absent we can not do that. If we can not do better, we will ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment in the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. I want to say in justice to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], who is not present at this moment, that I had a conversation with him in regard to this amendment, and at that time he supposed it related to only a few entries. The object of the amendment, as understood by him at the time, was merely to put the contestants in the condition in which they would have been if the repealing act had not taken effect, simply to remit them to the rights which they had before that repealing act took effect. Now, it is possible and undoubtedly true, as stated here, that since that time, in view of the legislation and of the dismissal of those contests, other persons have acquired rights, and hence the matter has become complicated. I think, therefore, it is well enough that at some subsequent time we should consider the question more fully.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact that the effect of this amendment will be to give the contestant a prior right of entry over the contestee?

Mr. SPRINGER. The intention was simply to give these parties the rights they had before the repealing clause went into effect.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment has been already passed upon by the committee, and this debate is all out of order.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ENLOE] about the "ignorance" of members on this side who voted against his amendment.

Mr. ENLOE. I hope the gentleman will not confine it to that side. [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Of course it is understood that all the intelligence and all the purity are concentrated in the gentleman from Tennessee. [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. I believe there are some men on the floor who understand this subject quite as well as the gentleman from Tennessee. Under the act of 1843 this Bureau was reorganized, and that law is in existence to-day. Under the plan of reorganization the Treasury Department and the President of the United States established in 1887 a well-digested set of rules, which not only control the appointment in the Bureau but prescribe the qualifications which men must have who fill those appointments, and my impression is that those rules having been adopted in 1887, long after the Civil Service Commission went into operation, this Bureau is not under the civil service, but is under the rules and regulations made and approved by the Treasury Department and the President of the United States.

Mr. ENLOE. What does the gentleman think, then, about that telephone message which was read here by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY]?

Mr. MAHON. I do not know anything about that. I am talking from the books and not from any mere ipse dixit. The assistants and the subassistants are appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury. All the aids are appointed with his approval. They must be men not only well qualified physically for the places, but they must be men who have graduated at some scientific college such as prepares its graduates for the kind of work done in that Bureau. Where would you find a commission in the United States qualified to examine men for that intricate and delicate work unless you took the very men who have been trained in the Bureau? Now, Mr. Chairman, under this plan thirty well-considered, carefully digested rules have been prescribed regulating the appointment, the pay, and the qualifications of all who are employed in that Bureau, from the Superintendent down, and putting them under the control of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ENLOE. Does the gentleman understand that the clerical force employed in that Bureau is not subject to the civil-service rules?

Mr. MAHON. I am not talking about the clerical force; I am talking about the men employed in the scientific work.

Mr. ENLOE. I agree with you about that.

Mr. MAHON. I make the assertion that this Bureau is open to every member of Congress and to every citizen of the United States who wishes to inspect it, and that it is as well conducted under these rules and regulations as any Bureau in the city of Washington. Every dollar that it expends must be reported to the Auditor of the Treasury, who audits the accounts of the Bureau and holds its officers to a strict account. Now, Mr. Chairman, why disturb this Bureau in its present relations? It is to-day absolutely under the Treasury Department, and if any gentleman will read these rules with care, he will come to the conclusion that there is no necessity for any further legislation in regard to this Bureau as to its work in detail or its control. Therefore I voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee on the information I had obtained from the books and from the record of the Department.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I hope we shall now have a vote. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] comes first, being intended to perfect the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the matter which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] proposes to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reorganize the said office force by the reduction of their number or compensation, or both, so as to bring the whole of said compensation within the sum of $125,000 for the fiscal year 1895, and he shall submit estimates in detail for the said office force, as reorganized hereunder, in his annual estimates to Congress for the fiscal year 1896.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

The amendment was read, as follows:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to affect the civil service rules in so far as applicable to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], which is intended to perfect the text, takes precedence of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, which is to strike out.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. DINGLEY was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the Chairman declared that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 51, noes 95.

Mr. REED. I think we ought to have a quorum on this. It appears to be a party measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum being made, the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS].

The committee again divided; but before the count was completed the following took place:

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the point of no quorum is withdrawn?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the vote on the consideration of the motion that I have made be postponed until to-morrow morning.

Mr. SAYERS. It is understood also, Mr. Chairman, that no further debate shall be had upon this matter without unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman move that the committee rise?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir. I simply agree that the vote on this matter be postponed until to-morrow morning.

Mr. CULBERSON. What is the proposition, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is that the vote on this matter be postponed until to-morrow morning, the point of no quorum to be withdrawn.

Mr. REED. No. The point is not withdrawn except for that purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is not withdrawn?

Mr. REED. Not except for that purpose. I am willing, as a part of the unanimous consent, that this matter may go over until to-morrow morning, and that the rest of the bill be now proceeded with.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the point is withdrawn temporarily.

Mr. REED. It is temporarily withdrawn, for the purpose stated.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is withdrawn on condition that unanimous consent is given for the postponement of the consideration of this question until the next legislative day. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the portion of the bill relating to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The next matter reserved is on page 63 of the bill.

Mr. SETTLE. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to a paragraph on page 35.

Mr. SAYERS. I object.

Mr. SETTLE. I will state to the committee that at the time the part of the bill which I wish to amend was read in committee, I was temporarily and unavoidably absent from the House; otherwise I should have asked to be heard at that time.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What is the provision?

Mr. SETTLE. The provision I wish to amend is that which appropriates $50,000 to the use of the Internal Revenue Department for the purpose of detecting and punishing violators of the internal-revenue laws. The reason I desire to be heard on this matter now is that the testimony on which this appropriation was allowed by the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order unless the gentleman gets unanimous consent.

Mr. SAYERS. When we come to the appropriations for the judiciary I will give the gentleman a chance.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have an understanding with the gentleman from Texas that when another portion of the bill is reached I shall be allowed an opportunity to be heard on this matter. Hence I do not press it just now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. SETTLE. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

Under Missouri River Commission: For improving Missouri River from its mouth to Sioux City, Iowa, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling and miscellaneous expenses of the Missouri River Commission, surveys, permanent bench marks and gauges, $750,000, $50,000 of which may be used for removal of snags and other like obstructions in the Missouri River above Sioux City, Iowa, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, when I asked the other day to have this item passed over, my object was to ascertain a fact which I had been unable to ascertain up to that time, and to give the Committee on Rivers and Harbors opportunity to consider a question which that Committee had then before it. The Missouri River is one of the most treacherous and destructive streams in this country. No one except those personally acquainted with the character of that stream can have the least conception of the destruction and waste that is now going on there at some points. For the purpose of information I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a newspaper clipping which does not in the least exaggerate the facts, which indeed does not state them as strongly as truth would warrant.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTO THE RIVER—JUDGE HORTON'S LAND HAS BEEN WASHED AWAY AT ATCHISON—THE BIG MUDDY IS NOW FAST ENCROACHING UPON THE TRACKS OF THE SANTA FE—MANY FARMS ALREADY GONE—THE BIG BRIDGE AT ATCHISON IN GREAT DANGER OF BEING CUT OFF.

The Missouri River at Atchison is on another rampage. One of its latest acts was to wash away 40 acres of valuable land belonging to Chief Justice Horton, on what is known as Toftes Island, just above Atchison. But this is only a very small part of the "Big Muddy's" depredations.

About 3 miles east of Atchison, in Buchanan County, Mo., is a chain of lakes. Five years ago the erratic river showed signs of uneasiness and threatened to leave its channel and take a shoot down through these lakes. Congress was importuned, and by a system of riprapping, at a cost of $150,000, the channel was kept within its proper course.

The dikes put in five years ago were not permanent, however, and as they wore out, the big stream began working its way back into Missouri's shore. When the ice went out of the river a few weeks ago, the last one of the dikes went with it. The river then made another break for freedom through the Missouri lakes. It made a cut across the end of the island, eating up the land of Judge Horton, then attacked the farm of Mrs. James Fisk, in Missouri. This lady had 160 acres, and all that is left now is 6 acres. Charles Stier has lost 90 acres, and the houses of all the farmers in the vicinity have been moved back several times. Now the river is within 200 feet of the Santa Fe tracks at Pawpaw Junction. This station is used jointly by the Santa Fe, Burlington, and Rock Island, and the three roads are actively preparing to move their tracks back to the bluff to escape the big Missouri.

The people of Winthrop, just opposite Atchison, have refused to pay their taxes this year. They say they will hold on to their money until they find that their land is secure. They do not believe in paying taxes upon land in the middle of the Missouri River.

Mr. BRODERICK. I now ask that my amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 1, page 64, the following words: "seventy-five thousand dollars of which, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to strengthen banks and improve the river, shall be used at and near Atchison, Kans., and at Leavenworth, Kans.

Mr. BRODERICK. The clipping just read from the Clerk's desk——

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment, as it changes existing law.

Mr. BRODERICK. The clipping just read gives some idea of the urgency which exists——

The CHAIRMAN. The impression of the Chair is that discussion upon the amendment had begun before the gentleman from Texas rose to reserve the point.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman offered his amendment and was proceeding to discuss it; but just as soon as I could get the Chair to recognize me I made my point.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Texas rose in time to make the point. I took notice of that fact.

The CHAIRMAN. Had the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] proceeded to discussing his amendment after he had offered it?

Mr. BRODERICK. I had the clipping read before offering the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order will be reserved.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, the clipping which has been read gives some idea of what has been going on at the point referred to. The Missouri River Commission has been applied to to give some relief; but the chairman of the commission says they have no means of giving relief without special legislation. Up to this time, at any rate, they decline to do anything at either Atchison or Leavenworth without special legislation.

Now, the Missouri River, as is well-known by most members from the West, is of very little use as a commercial highway. About all that can be done for it and for that country is the protection of its banks and the preservation of its bridges, thereby enabling the people living along that stream in the different States to carry on interstate commerce. There are very few steamers that go up the stream, so few that when one is expected at Kansas City the fact is advertised in advance, and I understand the people of the city go down to the river's bank to see the steamer as a curiosity.

Thus it will be seen that this river is comparatively worthless as a highway of commerce. The repair of these places where the banks are breaking and property is thus being destroyed is about all that the commission can do to aid the people along that stream. I hope the amendment will be adopted. For the information of some gentlemen who did not hear the amendment read I will state that it does not ask for an additional appropriation; it does not increase expenses in any way; it only proposes to set aside $75,000 of the appropriation named in the bill for work at the points named.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Are not all these expenditures of money on the Missouri River made now under a law of Congress providing that the Missouri River shall be improved by stretches or reaches, or whatever else the technical term may be?

Mr. BRODERICK. I think that the commission may use a portion of the money at its discretion. Last fall there was some work done at St. Joseph. Under the law 25 per cent was to be reserved from the continuing contracts. I understand that a portion of that 25 per cent is now on hand, but most part of it has been expended at the points where the banks are being broken. But there is no place on the river where there is such an emergency as at Atchison and Leavenworth.

Mr. MERCER obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] another question.

Mr. MERCER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman from Kansas know anything of a scheme being on foot to induce that Missouri River Commission to spend money this year up about St. Joseph and Leavenworth, instead of down at the mouth of the river, where it ought to be spent.

Mr. BRODERICK. I did not hear the whole of the gentleman's question.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say, do you know anything of a scheme being on foot to divert the expenditure of the appropriations for the improvement of the Missouri River this year, from the lower portion of the river, from Jefferson City to its mouth, and to expend the money in the neighborhood of St. Joseph and Leavenworth?

Mr. BRODERICK. I know of no scheme except to get the appropriation for these points where the river is cutting the banks. That is all I am interested in.

Mr. MERCER. I send to the desk an amendment in the form of a substitute for the paragraph.

Mr. SAYERS. My point of order is that the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK] changes existing law; and I presume before a substitute can be offered it will be necessary for the Chair to rule upon the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order can still be reserved.

Mr. SAYERS. I reserve a point of order also on the proposition of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER].

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to offer an amendment to the text.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] has the floor.

Mr. MERCER. I ask that the amendment I have sent to the desk be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the whole section referring to the Missouri River Commission, and substitute therefor the following:

"Under Missouri River Commission: For improving Missouri River from its mouth to the south line of Sioux City, Iowa, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling and miscellaneous expenses of the Missouri Commission surveys, permanent bench marks, and gauges, $740,000; $50,000 of which may be used for the removal of snags and other like obstructions in the Missouri River above Sioux City, Iowa, and from the south line thereof; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War; and $150,000 of which shall be expended in the construction, repair, maintenance, and extension of revetments, dikes, and other works between the mouth of the Platte River, in Nebraska, and Sioux City, Iowa."

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, the people of Omaha and Council Bluffs have been buffeted from pillar to post by the Missouri River Commission and by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for lo these many days, and we are very uncertain as to whether the relief so often prayed for will ever be granted. That these cities are entitled to assistance no one denies. The Commission and the committee are both profuse in sympathy, but very slow of action. There is a system of labor being performed by the Missouri River Commission to-day which has passed beyond the comprehension of the average man who resides along the Missouri River north of Jefferson City. It seems that there is a 16-mile stretch near Jefferson City into which money has been poured for the last three or four years in enormous quantities; and during the next year I believe a large sum is to be expended upon this same reach. It is high time that other parts of the river receive some attention. At the present rate of work performed Omaha will be reached in two hundred years.

Now, members on this floor have informed me that the banks at the mouth of the Missouri River need some improvement, that there is damage being done there, and that something should be done by legislation for the protection of the banks of the river at that point. I know that the same condition of affairs exists at Omaha and Council Bluffs, and if the Government is determined to expend so much money each year for the improvement of rivers and harbors this money should be spent where the greatest good will be done to the greater number of people.

I am told by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that it is the policy, as adopted in the Fifty-first Congress and pursued since, that the Missouri River must be improved from its mouth up and toward its source. If that is so, why is not that policy pursued with reference to the mouth of the river, and why is a jump of one hundred and twenty or one hundred and thirty miles north made to one particular spot, overlooking, as it were, intermediate territory? I take it, Mr. Chairman, that if the Missouri River Commission has the discretion which the law says it has, and if it desires to do justice to the commercial centers along the river, that Commission will see to it that the banks and property along the Missouri River at commercial points are protected, and not that one part or reach of the Missouri River should receive thousands and thousands of dollars, to the detriment of other parts of the river. At the cities of Omaha and Council Bluffs there is $10,000,000 worth of property depending upon legislation favoring improvement of the Missouri River banks at these places. The people of these cities have expended in times gone by in the neighborhood of $600,000 in improving the Missouri River banks.

The Omaha Smelting Works have expended thousands of dollars in protecting the banks in front of their property. The Government has expended $120,000 at or near Council Bluffs; and if something is not done by this Congress through legislation to compell the Missouri River Commission to protect this work at Council Bluffs it will be wiped out of existence, and that much money will be thrown away.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what I desire is that this Congress shall recognize the fact that there are some places along the Missouri River needing attention outside of that 16-mile reach, for which so much has already been done. There is something at the mouth of the Missouri River that needs attention. Atchison, St. Joseph, and Leavenworth need attention. Omaha and Council Bluffs need attention, and Sioux City needs attention. Recognize the principal cities along this river in an equitable manner, and complaints will be few and far between. If this can not be done we had better abolish all river commissions and deal with these troubles direct.

Again, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the point of order that the gentleman raises, I desire to say that my substitute reduces this appropriation $10,000. And again, the substitute is perfectly germane to this section. I do not think the point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] is well taken, and I trust this House, in all fairness, will see to it that the parts of the Missouri River which most need protection shall be recognized in this bill, and at this time.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of this House to the following statement pertaining to this matter:

CHICAGO, November 19, 1892.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Omaha reach—Florence to Union Pacific Railway bridge.

The characteristics of the Omaha reach are known from surveys for the United States which have been made with more or less regularity since 1877. These surveys show very fully the succession of changes in shore lines and river bed, and the general surveys carried over the river in 1879 and 1890 develop the character of the river above and below. The last survey, made for the purpose of this report in October of this year, shows the location of the river bed and of the main shore lines as they now exist.

The object sought is the fixation of the river in a proper course on account of the very large and growing property interests in the twin cities of Omaha and Council Bluffs that would be menaced by any material change. The interests of commerce are also concerned in a permanent location at the bridge crossings. Such works as are required for these objects promote in the highest degree the navigability of this reach as a part of the general improvement of the Missouri River.

The Omaha reach extends from Florence to the Union Pacific Railway bridge, a distance of 10 miles. The general or average width between the shore lines at ordinary high water is 2,200 feet, or about 800 feet in excess of the average width across low water and low bars. This general width, however, does not represent the proper width of the river, or that really necessary for the flow of the stream, but rather the space over which the stream has wandered in recent years, or during the time required for bars to build up, become covered with vegetation, or a growth of willows and cottonwood, and be regarded as fast land. On the whole, the changes due to the cut-off of 1877, just above the smelting works, have worked themselves out; and generally the course of the river and its stability have steadily improved up to the time of the October survey. Material changes from natural causes in the future are likely on the whole to be disadvantageous to improvement, and highly detrimental to very important interests that are adjusting themselves to the course the river is now shaping.

The same favorable conditions do not obtain above or below. Above Florence the rapid cutting of the point of the bend on the east shore throws the stream lower down against the bluffs, and this action can not continue indefinitely without producing radical changes in the bend below Florence and altering the conditions at the northwestern dikes so as to greatly disturb the course below, the ultimate effect of all of which can not be foretold. This danger is by no means remote, and the adoption of remedial measures should not be delayed. Below Omaha bridge such changes are occurring as indicate an uneasy disposition of the river, and between that point and Plattsmouth radical changes have occured in recent years and are now occurring which, in the readjustment that must follow, are a serious menace to the Omaha Reach.

In 1879, prior to the St. Marys cut-off above the mouth of the Platte, the distance by the course of the river from the Omaha bridge to Plattsmouth bridge was 33¼ miles. In 1890 this distance had shortened to 24½ miles, a decrease in length of about 27 per cent. During the same time no material change in length occurred in the river above from Omaha to Blair. The general experience with the river is that notwithstanding cut-offs and wanderings the length between fixed points, say 100 miles apart, will not in time show material alteration; in other words, that any shortening or other abrupt development is local and temporary. The river may wander and change its course, but the substantial length and average characteristics prevail. It is also believed that radical changes for the most part find their normal readjustment up stream.

These lessons of experience are in harmony with sound theory. It is obvious that the energy of the stream or the work which it can do is measured by the fall in a given distance. The fall per mile between Omaha and Plattsmouth has been increased by over one-third, and this surplus of energy will occasion wandering and spreading until sooner or later it works itself out in recovered length.

If the conditions favored the recovery of this length below Omaha, then the menace might not be serious to the Omaha Reach. They do not appear favorable, and no judgment can be formed as to whether the river will or will not, in the early future and in a brief season, take on comparative stability in the region of present instability with a transfer of slope and unstable conditions up stream. Should this occur, it is a question as to whether the Omaha reach could stand the strain of this surplus of energy until it had worked through to the river above, which is in a much more susceptible condition. If the Omaha reach was well secured throughout in a fair course of moderate width, unquestionably the transfer of any undesired conditions would be effected without material local damage.

The Omaha reach has not undergone recently other than the ordinary changes normal to the Missouri River as a result of flood seasons and the enormous amount of material shifted in its bed. At the present time the course as a whole, is very favorable to further improvement. The bend below Florence is a proper shape for bank revetment, and certain dike work should be done on the left bank, opposite and below Florence, with a view to better controlling the direction of the stream into the bend and building up the low and broad bar, and which extends well down towards the northwestern dikes. The course at and above the northwestern dikes is favorable and should be made permanent in the present position. From this point down to the point of bend opposite Omaha, the Council Bluffs or left bank, has been revetted for a distance of 5 miles. This bend has a pocket which should be masked by a dike in order to insure stability of course below in the 2½ miles approaching Omaha.

Aside from the holding of the concave banks in their present position, the situation reduces to a control of the run into the bend at and below Florence, fixation of the river at the northwestern dikes, and a masking of the pocket above the new railway bridge. It would be well also if in training the river the bend above the smelting works and in the approach to the highway bridge could be corrected by a course farther out and with less curvature. Property interests would be materially served thereby, and no doubt of themselves will in time bring about an easier course.

The question of allowable width is of importance, as a greater width than the proper requirements of the stream encourages wandering or change of channel, and affords better opportunity for unstable conditions to be effective. From a pretty full consideration of the matter for the entire river and extending through several years, 817 feet was fixed between Sioux City and Plattsmouth, and this may be safely adopted for any local requirement, and no doubt fixed banks that distance apart would be sufficient for the needs of the stream. This will seem to some who have not give any consideration to the matter of cross-section and scour as affected by variations in stage of water, as very narrow, and the more conservative width of 1,000 feet at ruling points will be entirely safe and probably more expedient.

If the width is controlled and fixed at a ruling point it will usually take care of itself in the bends lying between or require slight aid in building up the bars and reducing the section to the normal width, and thus broad areas will be recovered from the wandering river course to become in time fast land.

On the other hand, should nothing further be done to the Omaha reach we may expect the following results:

1. Changing conditions at Florence which will give rise to a shifting river in the bend below with heavy bank erosion and frequent bar changes.

2. A dropping down of the river's course below the northwestern dike and such a direct assault on the revetment as would probably destroy the same and confuse the course of the river below.

3. Shifting into and out of the pocket above the new bridge with a corresponding variation of the river in its approach to Omaha and difficult control of the channel at the bridge site.

All these conditions are favorable as furnishing points of attack in case of complication arising by which the unstable conditions below Omaha should be transferred into the Omaha reach.

It may be confidently stated that the Omaha reach is in better shape at this time than for many years past, and that future conditions and changes will be detrimental and possibly result in instability of a radical character. For these reasons it should at once be fully secured in a proper course by works of a substantial character.

The map of the October surveys shows clearly the place of the stream, the height of bars, and the course of the main banks. It bears out fully the conclusion that the ruling points are at Florence, the northwestern dikes, and at the pocket, 2½ miles above Omaha, the variations at these points being most largely responsible for the wandering channel and the varicose conditions below.

The matter of improvement will only be referred to in its general features, as the cost in advance of a knowledge of what the specific conditions will be when the funds are actually available and the specific plan that should be applied at each locality can not be stated except in its limits.

The several works will be referred to in what seems their natural order of development as affecting the several interests to be guarded.

1. The Pocket.—This will require a substantial system of dykes and cross-dykes, by which the pocket is to be recovered and a new shore line established which will continue the bend above on a fair curve so that the river will follow the Iowa shore to the vicinity of the new bridge, about three-fourths of a mile below the pocket. The longitudinal dyke for the new shore line will have a length of 4,000 to 5,000 feet and about an equal length of cross-dyke will be required, all estimated to cost $75,000.

2. Florence Bend.—This should have a substantial revetment from Florence down for about 3 miles, and the present bank line seems to be very favorable. How far the situation may be changed by another high water can not be told. This work should all be carried out in one season and will cost about $120,000.

3. Northwestern Dikes.—The river should be here trained and secured in a definite course so as to give an easy run into the bend below without direct assault on the banks. How permanent the revetment below the dikes may be I can not say, but it would require to be of the most unusual character to withstand direct and changing assaults. The proper and easy control below demands a fixed course in this locality. Probably a mile will require training and securing at an estimated cost of $60,000, although this estimate is subject to many contingencies.

4. Florence Dikes.—On the Iowa shore, opposite and below Florence, a mile of work may be judicious with a view to giving positive direction to the stream in Florence bend. The character and amount of work at this point is necessarily tentative in view of developments above, but an estimate of $60,000 should be sufficient for the probable requirements.

The foregoing aggregates $300,000. There may be incidental work which it would be judicious to undertake. These works, however, cover what is required to put the reach under control, though it might be well to increase the estimate to $350,000 to cover unforeseen contingencies.

Other works may properly follow, but as they will be more local and of a character to fix banks in more detail and build up bars, and must be projected in view of results that may follow the works outlined, no estimate is submitted. They will all be beneficial in more definitely fixing and securing the river and in determining its width and will be aided largely by the bank interests.

The question of what should be done in the short bend above the smelting works has been alluded to, but no project is submitted, as this locality does not appear to be specially menaced. No doubt a material change could be made which would be beneficial to the river and of advantage to property interest, and the depth of the underlying rock would seem to favor a correction. It is a matter requiring more and special study in view of the proximity to the two bridges.

Very respectfully submitted,

L. E. COOLEY, Consulting Engineer.

To ARTHUR S. POTTER, Omaha, Nebr.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have arranged the questions of difference respecting the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and in order that that part of the bill may be closed up, I ask unanimous consent of the committee to return to it and to consider this amendment, which is entirely satisfactory to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think it is satisfactory to both sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks unanimous consent to return to the part of the bill with reference to the Coast and Geodetic Survey for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. PICKLER. I desire to ask what becomes of this subject that we have under consideration.

Mr. SAYERS. We will immediately return to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] will first be reported, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

Strike out the words from the word "and," in line 24, page 22, to and including the word "within," in line 2, on page 23, and insert the following:

"And the Secretary of the Treasury shall reduce the number or compensation, or both, of said office force so as to make the whole of said compensation equal to."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to recurring for the purpose of considering this amendment.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment which has just been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Now the motion to strike out offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] ought to be negatived.

Mr. SAYERS. My understanding is that the unanimous consent to consider this amendment disposed of that.

Mr. REED. That is all right if it is so understood.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] was recognized.

Mr. PICKLER. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON] is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a day or two ago my esteemed friend from Mississippi took me somewhat to task in a kindly way——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, just a moment——

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if that matter is settled, and I have the floor, I would like to be advised of it.

Mr. REED. It is not quite settled yet.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was to take the place of the motion I made; and in view of its adoption I will withdraw my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. What does the gentleman refer to? The pending amendment was offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SAYERS. But this has reference to the Coast and Geodetic Survey. The language that has just been read is the language that was agreed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, by unanimous consent, was adopted.

Mr. REED. And then the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] is withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought that amendment had been finished.

Mr. SAYERS. It has.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. My motion was still pending as an amendment when this amendment was offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's motion for what?

Mr. REED. The motion of the gentleman from Illinois was to strike out the paragraph; but the paragraph having been amended to suit him, he withdraws the motion to strike out, and that leaves it as the Chair understands it, there remaining simply a technical difficulty that the Chairman has to get over.

Mr. COGSWELL. Do I understand that that matter is now closed up? I want it to go on record.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. It is.

The CHAIRMAN. Wait a moment. Let the Chair see.

Mr. SAYERS. It is closed.

Mr. COGSWELL. I understand it is so, but the decision of the Chair would make me feel happier about it.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the gentleman from Illinois withdraws his motion to strike out?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. DOCKERY. That disposes of all that portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Information is given to the Chair that the gentleman from Illinois withdraws his motion to strike out the paragraph on pages 22 and 23. Is there objection to the request to withdraw that motion? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, that closes up the portion of the bill relating to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. COGSWELL. And we do not return to the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. That is all there is of it. The committee is now considering the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, a day or two ago my esteemed friend from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], in a kindly way, took me somewhat to task for exhibiting some little degree of sectionalism upon the floor of this House. I rise to assure the gentleman from Mississippi that no member upon this floor is actuated with less sectionalism than I am. I certainly wish, so far as I can, by my voice and by my vote, to contribute in every way and in every manner possible to that which will bring prosperity and happiness to the people of his State and to all sections of the South; but I can not resist the temptation to make a comparison between the twelve favored projects brought in upon this sundry civil appropriation bill and the practical damage done to the people of the section I have the honor in part to represent.

Now, sir, when we go before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to seek some appropriations for my State, with 1,900 miles of shore line with vast rivers and harbors, we are told to take our station at the end of the table and to be brief. We are then told, after we have made an argument, that we can only have one-fifth of the estimates recommended by the engineers of the United States; and yet when we come in with this bill on the floor of this House, what do we find? We find that the appropriation recommended, not by the engineers of the United States, but by civilians almost, men appointed for political reasons, these projects receive what—5, 10, 15 per cent? No! They receive 100 per cent, or every dollar they have requested. I call the attention of the House and the committee to the report before the subcommittee which considered the sundry civil bill. It will make interesting reading when placed in the RECORD. At one point a major of the engineers testified as follows:

Q. The amount asked for Hay Lake is $150,000. How much have you got on hand?

A. Four hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

And when the honorable chairman of this committee, thinking of the condition of the Treasury, and desiring to avoid making appropriations that are unnecessary, asks—

Q. Why don't you use that amount?

He goes on further and says:

A. Because it freezes in winter, and we can not work all the time.

Will it not freeze next winter, gentlemen of the committee? And so, I say, taking the Mississippi River Commission for example, when we came to the consideration of that in the committee we ascertained that there were no estimates before the committee for any appropriation; and this report says:

Will you not very kindly send in an estimate for the Mississippi Commission?

Mr. Chairman, when you or I, or any other member of the House, goes before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, he knows if you have no estimates you can not have a single dollar; but you have kindly sent out and got an estimate, and the result is $2,000,000 appropriations on the sundry civil appropriation bill. I say, gentlemen, it is unfair; it is unjust. It is inequitable to every other section of the country. I ask that the portion of the country which I have the honor to represent shall be treated in the same way and in the same manner as the section of every other member upon this floor is treated. If it is to be 5 per cent, let us make it 5 per cent for all. Now, look at it for instance. Distinguished gentlemen come and say we are ungenerous to the South. They come in preaching economy, they come in preaching reform, and yet here is a tabulated statement of the appropriations that have been made for rivers and harbors in the entire country from its organization. Up to 1890 you appropriated $76,000,000 to the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, and you added $20,000,000 and over for the Gulf States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MERCER. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Washington be extended twenty minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I only want three or four minutes more.

Mr. LOUD. Is not the gentleman speaking on the point of order, and is he not recognized for an hour?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been reserved.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to continue his remarks for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I am always under obligations to my esteemed friend. Every day he places me under more obligation to him on this floor, and I hope the time may come when I shall have an opportunity in some small way to reciprocate the many obligations that I am under to my distinguished friend from Texas. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to print in the RECORD the testimony taken before the committee. I want to place it in the RECORD to show the House, to show the country, that those who are standing here every day talking and preaching economy, by whom we are told every day we must cut down the expenditures of the Government, are bringing in appropriations for twelve favored projects when large sums remain unexpended of the appropriations made at the last session of Congress; and to say to you, sir, that you may talk about your low tariff, and talk about your high tariff, and talk about your tariff for revenue only, but so long as you gentlemen continue to appropriate $500,000,000 every year somebody has got to pay the fiddler while they do the dancing. [Laughter.]

This money comes out of the common people. What we contend for is that while we are charged with these appropriations in the West, the only instance and the only time, the only place, the only circumstance where you have ever cut down the expenses of this Government in clerk hire in any of the Departments was in the General Land Office, where we pay every dollar of the expenditures by the fees and from the lands sold in our section. You cut down the force of the Land Office, and yet we gave you a net revenue of $4,000,000 last year.

Mr. DOCKERY. And they were cut down on the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Yes, they were cut down on the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and the gentleman should have added that he was a Republican.

I say that you apply to my section of the country a rule which is unjust and unfair. We should be treated as others are treated. I propose to place in the RECORD, if I can have the consent of the committee, a tabulated statement coming down to 1890, which will show just where the money has gone. Mr. Chairman, these contracts ought to be abolished. I know it is the law, but I know, too, that when I go to my able friend, the chairman of the committee, and ask him for an increased appropriation for Olympia Harbor, he will say to me, and say very properly: "We have got to keep this bill down; we have got to keep it under ten millions. There are eight millions on the sundry civil bill charged to this bill." So others are receiving a hundred per cent while my colleagues and I are allowed only one-fifth of the Engineer's estimate. That is the unfairness of which we complain.

If the Rivers and Harbors Committee can not afford to give me over one-fifth of the estimate, then they can not afford to give over one-fifth to the Mississippi River. We have poured out $75,000,000 there already, and I think the facts will show that it has accomplished little or nothing up to date. Again, these commissions ought to be under the Army of the United States. Let us take the civilians off these commissions and save these salaries of five or six thousand dollars a year. I know of a man from Indiana who was appointed fifteen years ago on the Mississippi River Commission just because he had been defeated for Congress, and he is still there at five thousand a year.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Yes, an intelligent gentleman, too.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Yes, he is an intelligent gentleman. But he is like a man who came up from Virginia to look for an office, and who said he didn't know just what he wanted, but he thought he would take a "sinecure." [Laughter.]

Mr. STOCKDALE. He is the most efficient man on the Commission.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Very likely. But when you stand up here and vote to send Indian agents into my country from Alabama and Georgia and South Carolina and Texas, you ought to be willing to agree to give up these places and let the Army officers to do the work of these commissions. Why, I am afraid they are going to depopulate Georgia before the present honorable Secretary of the Interior gets through. [Laughter.] They will not appoint any Democrats belonging to my State to any little office, even as special agent to remove a few Indians.

They sent us a gentleman only the other day, one from the State of Tennessee; and so it is all along the line, as far as the West is concerned. You are continually doing us great injustice, gentlemen. We are weak now, we are powerless now, but the time will come when we shall have votes sufficient to do something in this House, and in that day—I, speaking for my people, say that they will not be as unjust to your constituents as you are upon this bill and upon the river and harbor bill to the people that I represent.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, there are many appropriation bills reported to and passed by this House. Aside from the six or seven that come from the Appropriations Committee, we have large bills from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, from the Indian Committee, and from the Committee on Agriculture, and I think if my friend from Washington would show to this House what his section of the country has received in all those different bills he would then be unable to complain that his constituents have been discriminated against. For instance—and only as one case upon which I can lay my hand at this moment—I have here a statement of the appropriations for land surveys for eight years, including 1893. Out of a million and a half of dollars appropriated, to be divided among twenty-six States, how much do you think the gentleman got for his State?

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I know.

Mr. COGSWELL. So do I. A little over a million and a half of dollars was appropriated for twenty-six States, and the gentleman's State got $250,000 of that—a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. COGSWELL. Not for a moment just now. [Laughter.] Montana, Oregon, and Washington—I take these three Western States as my eye falls upon them—received out of that large appropriation nearly $700,000. I do not say that they received too much, but when a man from a particular section gets up here and picks out a special item in this appropriation bill and complains that his people have got nothing in it and that some other part of the country has got too much, I think it is proper to call attention to these other appropriations. The gentleman's statement is not fair. Let him take account of all the public moneys that are appropriated from the Treasury and see if he can then claim that it has been unfairly distributed. The gentleman says, "Give me my pro rata of this bill," but would he take it on the land bill? Not for a moment.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Yes. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] has the floor.

Mr. COGSWELL. I have done.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I wish to say, in reply to the the gentleman from Massachusetts——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] is recognized.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Well, I will get the floor another time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I wish to say a few words at the beginning with regard to the amendment suggested concerning the appropriation for the Missouri River. I desire to make a longer statement than I can make in five minutes, and I should like to be allowed a little more time.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi be permitted to speak without limit.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, we have had under consideration for quite a number of years a plan proposed by the Missouri River Commission for the improvement of that river. That Commission, in the very inception of the work, urged upon Congress the absolute necessity of doing it in a systematic manner, beginning at the mouth of the river and working upward; but the River and Harbor Committee in past years, yielding to the anxiety and the solicitations of members who were interested in various localities on the river, declined to be governed by the recommendations of the Commission, and began to parcel out from the aggregate sum appropriated for the improvement of the Missouri amounts to be expended at this, that, and the other point.

As a matter of course, when one member of Congress succeeded in securing the designation of a specific sum for some particular locality in his district, it was but natural that other Representatives along the river should come and clamor for specific appropriations for localities in their districts. If you will turn to the river and harbor bill for 1888 you will find that the whole sum of $1,000,000 carried by that bill for the Missouri River was parceled out to the different localities upon that river without leaving the slightest discretion in the Commission or leaving one single dollar to be expended in pursuance of their general plan. When the work had reached this stage it became manifest to gentlemen interested in the river, and to the members of the River and Harbor Committee, that a halt had to be called. It must be remembered that while the Missouri is a great stream, pouring annually an immense volume of water into the Mississippi, it is yet a stream substantially without commerce.

There are so few boats navigating that river that they are scarcely worth mentioning in a discussion of this kind. Now, the scheme that Congress had entered upon was to so harness and control the waters of that angry stream as to adapt it to the needs of navigation, but we had departed entirely from that scheme and our operations had degenerated into a system which was an appeal to Congress not to make the stream navigable for steamboats but to protect private property along its banks. For, Mr. Chairman, it was not contended nor can it be contended, that the designation of particular sums contained in the bill of 1888 had any other purpose than to protect private property on the banks of the river, leaving the river itself utterly without commerce.

So we had reached a point in the history of that work when we were obliged to do one of two things—either to abandon this system of appropriating the money specifically to localities and leave the Commission the right to use it for the improvement of the navigation of the river, or else to strike the Missouri River from the river and harbor bill. And when we had reached that point we invited every gentleman in Congress who was at all concerned in that river to attend the meeting of the River and Harbor Committee and listen to the suggestions which we made in that direction. And after a full consultation the statement there made was accepted as true by those members, that we must either do one of two things—strike that river entirely from the bill, or cease this practice into which we had fallen of stripping the river commission of all authority and discretion and devoting money specifically to the preservation of private property.

In pursuance of the agreement then and there entered into, we provided in the act of 1890 for the appropriation of a general sum to be expended by the Missouri River Commission in its own discretion, leaving that Commission, however, by the express terms of the law, the power, if it chose to exercise it, to expend certain portions of the money at the harbors and localities on that river. And the act of 1892 followed in precisely similar language, appropriating a specific sum of money, with no direction or mandate whatever to that Commission, but at the same time leaving it the power, if it should chose to exercise it, to protect localities along the bank of that river.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question, in order that I may fully understand the thread of his argument.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. Is it understood that this money may now be devoted to the purpose of protecting private property from the inroads of the river?

Mr. CATCHINGS. The Missouri River Commission, in its discretion, having in view that the purpose is to improve the navigation of the river, may expend certain portions of this money at different localities or at different harbors, but always——

Mr. LOUD. That does not answer my question.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I thought I answered it—always having in view that the object is to improve the navigation of the river.

Mr. LOUD. Still it is discretionary with the Commission whether they shall use this money ultimately for the protection of private property, is it not?

Mr. CATCHINGS. It is not to be assumed, Mr. Chairman, that they would exercise that discretion for any other purpose than to improve the navigation of the river.

Mr. LOUD. Then it is merely an assumption, is it? There is no law that makes any prohibition as to their use of this money.

Mr. CATCHINGS. None at all.

Mr. LOUD. The matter, then, is entirely in the discretion of the Commission?

Mr. CATCHINGS. But of course, Mr. Chairman, we must credit that Commission with the same purpose which actuates all of us—to discharge public duties faithfully and to carry out the spirit as well as the letter of the law.

Mr. LOUD. I simply wanted to get at the fact of the matter.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] explain more definitely what he means by protecting private property? Does he mean rectifying the banks at cities?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I mean this: Of course, when you improve the navigation of the river, you do protect private property; but that is an incident of the work, not the main object of it. These appropriations, however, had been so parceled out that the navigation of the river had been lost sight of; and the money was confessedly and avowedly expended with no other object than to protect private property. At that period in the history of the work which I have mentioned we made the change I have described, and it has been carried on down to the present time.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if these amendments which my good friends here have suggested are to be adopted, we simply, by our own act, revert to that condition of chaos into which this work had fallen in 1890; and this presents a serious question for the House to consider. I am sure that this House would not for one moment entertain the proposition of making so radical a change with regard to the manner in which this stream shall be dealt with without the most careful and earnest consideration. So that even if these amendments were not subject to the point of order, I would say to the House that it would do well to proceed slowly and cautiously before reëmbarking upon a scheme which wrecked itself in the manner I have explained, because if we are to go back to the old system of permitting the whole appropriation to be expended at specific localities under the direction of Congress, we shall have lost sight of the only constitutional power that we have to expend one dollar of money upon that river, that is for the purpose of making it useful as an artery of commerce.

Mr. MERCER. If the Missouri River Commission is pursuing the system which the gentleman indicates in his line of argument, why is it that the repairs needed to-day at the mouth of the river can not be made?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can only answer that upon a supposition; for I have not consulted any member of that Commission as to the motives which have prompted them to spend a dollar here or a dollar there. I can only answer upon the assumption that they have seen proper to utilize a considerable portion of this money in the preservation of works which had already been constructed at certain localities approximating the mouth of that river.

Now, I sympathize very deeply with my friends on this floor who are interested in this river, and especially with my friend from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK]. I wish it were in our power to give a sufficient sum of money for the purpose which he advocates. I think it would be wise on the part of that Commission to divert a portion of the money at its disposal in meeting the imminent danger which is now threatening at Leavenworth and Atchison. So believing, I yesterday, with the consent of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, telegraphed to the president of that Commission, saying that it was the judgment and wish of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors that this danger should be averted if it could be done, and calling his attention to the very serious change threatened in the channel of the river.

Mr. MERCER. Are matters worse there than at Omaha and Council Bluffs?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Very much so, I think.

Mr. MERCER. I know that is not so.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will hasten on with my remarks, because I do not wish to detain the committee too long.

Mr. PICKLER. What was the answer of the president of the Commission?

Mr. CATCHINGS. He answered that the Commission had no money under its control which it could expend for this purpose. And if you will turn to the report of the Missouri River Commission you will find that on the 1st day of January last the Commission had expended every dollar we had appropriated except the sum of $78,000, which I presume they are retaining with a view to contingencies which are liable to arise in the prosecution of a great work like this. So the president of the Commission telegraphed back that the Commission had no money to devote to the purpose mentioned, but very clearly intimating his desire that Congress should put the Commission in possession of funds that this work might be done.

But, Mr. Chairman, if the Committee of the Whole should vote down these amendments, supposing that they do not go out upon the point of order, this question is still to be considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; and if after more mature consideration and reflection we feel that we can or ought to make such a recommendation, we will insert a provision to that effect in the river and harbor bill which we expect shortly to report. I do not state this for the purpose of having my young friend from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] who now stands before me, as handsome a picture as I ever beheld—— [Laughter.]

Mr. MERCER. Thank you.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Not for the purpose of inducing him to yield a particle of his right to press this amendment; but I state it frankly and candidly because it is the simple truth, as every member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors knows.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman repeat his statement as to the disposition of the River and Harbor Committee?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I said that the committee proposes to take under consideration carefully the propriety of undoing even in a small degree the work which we thought we had finally settled by the appropriation act of 1890, to the extent of permitting a diversion of some part of this fund at this locality and perhaps others.

My friend from Washington [Mr. WILSON], to whom I always listen with pleasure, has I think rather unjustly created the impression here, or tried to do so, that so far as these particular works are concerned, there has been some unfairness, which has resulted in undue benefit to the southern section of this country.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption right there? I think he must have misunderstood me. The thing I was declaiming against was that an undue discrimination is made, so that while you get 100 per cent we get but 20 per cent.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will take up that matter also; but it may not be amiss while we are on this question——

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I do not want you to charge Oregon to me.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not charge it at all. I do not charge anything to you. I am simply trying to make a frank and absolutely candid statement to the House as far as I can do so.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I would not assume for a single moment that the gentleman would do otherwise.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not intend to make any statement which is not absolutely and strictly correct; and of course I know that no gentleman here would suspect me of desiring to do otherwise.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have served upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors for many years. My distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. HENDERSON], who sits just on the other side of this aisle, has served on that committee from the day of its creation until now, and it has been a source of constant care and and thought to us how we might deal, with some show of economy, with the great works which were pressing for improvement.

It has become manifest to us after reading the reports of the engineers from year to year, that this Government, under the system which had theretofore prevailed, had been made annually to lose many millions of dollars, and that the commerce of this country had been made to suffer by the undue postponement of the completion of the greater projects which were demanding recognition at the hands of Congress.

And so we set our minds to the solution of the problem as to how we might expedite the completion of these great works, and at the same time exercise an economy which would be felt, which would manifest itself in the saving of millions of dollars to the Treasury. We came to the conclusion in that committee, Mr. Chairman, without a single dissentient vote, that it could be accomplished——

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if my friend will allow me a simple suggestion, I would say that Senator FRYE (if I may speak of the Senate) was the first to suggest this system.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That is true. It gives me great pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to pay that tribute to the distinguished Senator whose name has been mentioned. He has to my personal knowledge been one of the most useful members of the Committee on Commerce for many years. And we have always had not only his active and earnest, but his unusually intelligent coöperation in the management of these great works.

The suggestion did come from him, and it was carefully considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and we came, as I stated, to the conclusion, without one dissentient vote, that it could only be accomplished by doing it in a business-like way, by having these great works constructed as a man would undertake to construct a great private work on his own account; and so we provided, Mr. Chairman, that within the limits of the cost of the work it should be lawful for this Government to make contracts for the continuation and completion of the work in advance of appropriations. That is why these works are spoken of as contract works.

For instance, in the bill of 1890 we took on, under this system, the harbors of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Galveston, and the improvement of the St. Marys and Hay Lake Channels in the Great Lakes. We appropriated for all of these places in the bill of 1890 the sum of $2,340,000, and conferred upon the Secretary of War the right to make contracts for the completion of every one of these works, to be paid for by future appropriations, to be made by Congress.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. And every one of those came from the Senate.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Every one of those came from the Senate. The work was inaugurated in the Senate, under the masterful leadership of my distinguished friend, Senator FRYE.

In 1892, Mr. Chairman, the beneficial result of that system had so manifested itself that again, without a dissentient voice, in the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, we placed under the contract system twelve other of the great works, Point Judith in Rhode Island, the Hudson River, the Missouri River, the Upper Mississippi, by which I mean the river from Cairo north, the harbors of Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile, the Lower Mississippi, by which I mean the river from Cairo to the Gulf, St. Johns in Florida, Humboldt in California, the Cascades on the Columbia River, a ship channel running through the Great Lakes from end to end, and the Great Kanawha in West Virginia.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question relating to the Mississippi Valley?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am coming to that.

Mr. LOUD. The last appropriation contained $16,030,000 for the Mississippi River and its tributaries. That is continuous. Now, the question I desire to ask is this: I brought out the point heretofore that much of this money is being used ultimately for the purpose of protecting private property; that is, to prevent the river from breaking in over the banks.

Now, we could possibly stand $16,030,000 if that could possibly insure the completion of the improvements on the Mississippi River under this system of contracts, but we know that from the condition of the banks of that river these improvements must continue forevermore so long as the river flows to the sea.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will resume where my friend interrupted my remarks; but I will pause to say that I do not understand what he means by saying it will take $16,000,000 for the improvements of the Mississippi River.

Mr. LOUD. Do not the continuous contracts, covering four years, call for an expenditure of $16,000,000 for the Mississippi River improvements?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir.

Mr. LOUD. How much?

Mr. CATCHINGS. My recollection is, and I do not undertake to say that I am positive about the amount, that the appropriations for the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf amount to $10,000,000.

Mr. LOUD. Taking the whole Mississippi River?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Taking the whole Mississippi River, possibly you are correct.

Mr. LOUD. I took it from the bill at that time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Possibly you are correct in that statement.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me go along in the line of remarks I was about to make, and I will revert presently to the question of my friend. Taking on these twelve new projects, as I have said, in 1892 and we appropriated for them in the bill for that year the sum of $5,952,500; and we vested the Secretary of War with power to make contracts for the continuance of those works, to be paid for by appropriations thereafter to be made; and the appropriations contained in the sundry civil appropriation bill are appropriations made to cover contracts which had been made by the Secretary of War in pursuance of the power conferred upon him. And there is the reason, Mr. Chairman, even if we were disposed to economize upon these contracts, why it could not be done without unduly postponing the settlement of obligations which have been imposed upon the Government by the Secretary of War in pursuance of authority conferred upon him.

I repeat that these appropriations upon the sundry civil bill are made for the purpose of enabling this Government to discharge obligations incurred in pursuance of authority expressly conferred by law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one result of this new departure in the improvement of rivers and harbors has been that the improvement of the harbor of Humboldt, California, has been completed. So far as appropriations are concerned and under the contract entered into it will soon be finished in fact. The great work at the Cascades called for a large sum, which has been appropriated, though not entirely expended. It will shortly be completed without further appropriation. The great channel through the lakes, known in river and harbor phraseology as the "ship channel," has been completed. The improvement at St. Johns River is approaching completion, and now asks for no appropriation. And the same may be said as to the great works on the Kanawha. Baltimore Harbor has been actually completed for one or two years.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. What the gentleman means is that some of this work has not been completed, but the contracts have been made and the appropriations have been made which will complete them.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I mean to say that some of them have had sufficient appropriations to complete them, and some of them have actually been completed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, is there a member within the sound of my voice who will hesitate to give his adhesion to the correctness and safeness of a principle that permits Congress to place these great works under contracts? If they had been continued under the old practice, many years would have elapsed before they could have been completed, and in the meantime the interests of commerce would have suffered and the Treasury would have been put to much greater expense; because it must be borne in mind, Mr. Chairman, that with a single solitary exception, and that is the work at the mouth of the Columbia River, not one of the greater projects which Congress has undertaken to accomplish in the way of river and harbor improvement, certainly since I have been a member of Congress, has been completed within the estimates originally made. The cost, wherever they have reached completion, has gone many thousands of dollars beyond the original estimate. That is simply accounted for, because we only made appropriations for rivers and harbors once in two years; and great plants were organized, required to carry on the work; and when the appropriations failed these plants were broken up, employés were scattered, the boats and dredges became of no further use; and all this was done necessarily at a very great cost.

Mr. HERMANN. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him right there, merely to emphasize the point he was making in favor of the contract system, I will say a contract was made for the improvement at the mouth of the Columbia River and by that means a sum almost equal to $2,000 was saved on the original estimate and a depth of water from 17 to 30 feet was obtained and is now maintained.

Mr. CATCHINGS. That strongly corroborates the theory which pervades this contract system.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another result has been that every solitary one of these works which we have placed under contract has been completed, or will be completed, as is shown by a statement which I hold in my hand furnished to me by Gen. Casey, the Chief of Engineers, within the original estimates, while many of them have been or will be completed at a very great saving upon the original estimate. For instance, the Baltimore work was done at 15½ per cent less than the average prices paid prior to placing it under contract.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. In one moment. If gentlemen will turn to Humboldt Bay in California they will find that the whole work there has been done for $740,660, which it was expected would cost $1,715,115.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman may possibly be misleading himself, or he may mislead the House, when he speaks of these works being "done." He has spoken of the work in Humboldt Harbor. I am, of course, familiar with that. The gentleman understands, I suppose, that the work there has not been completed.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I simply mean that the whole work has been contracted for. I do not mean, in any case where I speak of these works being "done," to produce the impression that they have actually been completed, that the last lick of work has been done. I simply mean that the contracts have been made for the completed work and the total cost ascertained.

Turn to the Hay Lake Channel, one of the most important points in the chain of navigation of the Great Lakes, and you find that the work there was done for $900,000 less than the original estimate. Again, if you turn to the ship channel in the Great Lakes, you find that it is to be completed for $1,304,000, although it was expected and estimated to cost $3,340,000; so there is a saving of two millions upon that work alone.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to ask the gentleman a question bearing upon these savings under the contract system. How are these wild estimates accounted for? The gentleman has mentioned an estimate of $3 where an actual expenditure of $1 was found sufficient. How can that be explained?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can explain, I think, to the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire why it is that we accomplish the work in this way for so much less money than was originally estimated. Under the old system it was perfectly understood that we passed but one river and harbor bill in two years and the people who contracted to do this work made their bids with the knowledge of that fact, and the engineer was compelled to make his estimates with a view to the character of bids which he knew from experience he would receive. But now, since we go on so continuously that the contractor can utilize every moment of the year in which he can work at all, when he knows that when he once assembles his plant he can keep it in continuous use, he can afford to bid at a much lower rate, and the reports show that the change has begotten a great crop of bidders, because these works have become very desirable for contractors, and competition is much greater than under the old system.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The gentleman makes the point that there is a saving of expense under this contract system. Now, take Olympia Harbor, in my State, for which you have made appropriation. It is a fact that upon that coast, north of San Francisco, there is but one great dredger, and we had to bring that around by Portland to Olympia Harbor. The engineers of the United States, who seem to me to be as capable of making an estimate as any of the gentlemen who have made estimates for these twelve favored projects——

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. They were engineers.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The engineers of the United States estimated for Olympia Harbor that they could use advantageously $150,000 and complete that work while the dredger was at Olympia. Now, what I am complaining of is that we get only 20 per cent of that amount, $30,000, and the result will be that we will do that much work and then stop, and that work will not count, and we shall have to begin all over again. If it is a good thing to put these twelve favored works under the contract system in your State, or in any other State, why is it not a good thing to put such works under contracts in our section.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can only say to the gentleman that if I had my way about it, if I were absolute master of the situation and there were no other factors to be considered, I would place every one of these works that were worthy of being done at all, under the contract system. It would result not only in great expedition, but in most abundant response to the demands of commerce, and an enormous saving to the Treasury. But, Mr. Chairman, we are a practical people and we must act as practical men when we know that we can not do these things in that way. For instance, we know that when we had $22,000,000 in the river and harbor bill, a year or two ago, there was an enormous clamor all over the country that we were "boodlers," that we were robbing the Treasury. I say, sir, that if that bill had carried $50,000,000 it would not have carried a dollar too much.

Therefore we have to adopt this system by degrees. But I will say to the gentleman that when we shall have completed these works, which we shall probably do by the next Congress, I believe that we can then take twelve or fifteen other works and push them to completion under the contract system.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I trust that the gentleman will not forget me at that time. [Laughter.]

Mr. CATCHINGS. We will try to remember the gentleman.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have a statement here which I will ask leave, it being a matter of considerable interest, to print as a part of my remarks. It is a statement made for me by the Chief of Engineers, and I am sure that gentleman will be interested in reading it.

The statement is as follows:

MEMORANDUM PERTAINING TO CONTINUOUS CONTRACTS.

Point Judith Breakwater: Estimated cost, $1,100,000; amount of contract, $1,100,000.

Hudson River, Coxsackie to Troy: Estimated cost, $2,477,906; amount of contracts, $2,152,642.50; other work needed, $50,000; leaving a balance for contingencies, etc., of $242,263.50. So that the work has been let well within the estimated cost.

Philadelphia Harbor: Estimated cost, $3,500,000. The first contract failed; under this contract work was done to the amount of $94,084.18. New contract was let for the amount of $3,403,780; of this $320,000 was for work ordered by Congress but not included in the original estimate, and $142,000 for a change in the project, also ordered by Congress. Under this contract the price for dredging is 14.2 cents per yard, less than half the average price paid during the ten years on the Delaware for similar dredging preceding these contracts.

Baltimore Harbor: This work is now complete. The price in the continuing contract was 15½ per cent less than the average prices paid in the preceding ten years under the system of annual contracts.

Charleston Harbor: Estimated cost to complete, $2,178,000; amount of contract, $1,884,000; leaving for contingencies, $294,000; so that the work has been let well within the estimated cost.

Savannah Harbor: Estimated cost to complete, $3,150,000; amount of contracts, $2,906,000; therefore, inclusive of contingencies, safely within the estimate.

St. Johns River, Fla.: Estimated cost to complete, $397,000; contract for the entire amount, Mobile Harbor, Ala.: The act of July 13, 1892, authorized contracts aggregating $1,393,800; the same being $50,000 less than the estimate for completion. One contract for the entire work has been made at the low price of $7\frac{7}{10}$ cents per cubic yard, 8 per cent less than the price under the preceding contract, with an appropriation of $350,000, and 14 per cent less than the price under which work was performed at the time the estimate was made.

Humboldt Bay, Cal.: The act of July 13, 1892, authorized contracts to complete to the aggregate amount of $1,715,115; that being the estimated cost. One contract for the whole amount of work estimated as required has been let at prices which will aggregate for that amount of work the sum only of $740,660; which, with contingencies and repairs during the time of construction, will probably amount to about half of the estimated cost to complete.

Cascades Canal: The act of July 13, 1892, authorized contracts to the amount of $1,746,500; the estimate for completion. A contract for the entire work has been made, aggregating for the estimated quantities the total of $1,521,265; showing that the work will, under that contract, be completed within the estimate made.

St. Marys Falls Canal: The act of September 19, 1890, authorized contracts to be entered into to complete the work. Several contracts have so far been made, but several more are to be entered into and advertised for, and therefore a summary statement of the whole can not yet be made. The prices so far obtained for the portions let indicate that the work will be performed within the estimate.

Hay Lake Channel, St. Marys River: The act of September 19, 1890, authorized the making of contracts to complete the entire work. Contracts have been made for all the work, and it is expected that the work will be completed for a sum fully $900,000 within the estimated cost of the work.

Galveston, Tex.: The act of September 19, 1890, authorized contracts for the whole work. At one letting the lowest bidder failed to enter into contract. The work was again advertised, and operations are now being carried on under a contract made with the lowest bidder. The ultimate cost will depend on the length to which it may be found necessary to extend the jetties; but the loss by partial contracts would be large in quantity, in prices, and in the measure of success.

Ship channel in the Great Lakes: The project was estimated to cost $3,340,000, and the act of July 13, 1892, authorized contracts to be entered into for that amount. Contracts are now made for the whole, and they aggregate for the estimated quantities the sum total of only $1,304,434.38. So that the estimated quantity of work will be done for about one-half the estimate, inclusive of contingencies.

The saving in cost of a continuous contract to complete a given work over partial intermittent contracts can not be estimated simply by a comparison of figures obtained for units of material or of work. The great saving in cost arises in regard to items which can not be estimated. In many cases the actual quantities will be less for the former method. For instance, in constructing a jetty out into the sea, there will always be scour at the outer end. If the work be carried on slowly and interrupted at recurring intervals of time, the work will always be carried on in deeper water and more material will be needed.

Again, work left incompleted is always more subject to injury than completed work. Repairs are then needed, and it will be needful, too, to replace work carried away by exposure to the elements, storms, currents, etc. Then, again, the interrupted method is less fruitful in results. The measure of success which the jetties at the mouth of the Mississippi has had has been due to the fact that they were carried out rapidly to the bar which permitted the current to excavate a channel through the same, which has since persisted, notwithstanding that the outer slope of the bar has continued to progress seaward and will continue to do so always with continuing decrease of depth until the advance of the slope furnishes a foundation for the bar to form upon.

Had the work been carried on slowly or intermittingly, the same maximum result would not have been reached except at greater expense, and indeed the work might have been carried on so slowly that the bar would progress about as rapidly as the work did and would cost ultimately the same amount of money with little improvement in channel depths to show for it. Still further, as a business matter, the interest account previous to paying results is a matter of no small amount.

Under the system of continuing contracts it is judged that the works will be completed in one-half the time which would be required were the works to depend on biennial appropriations and a consequent succession of contracts.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Will the gentleman please state just what he means by the contract system? That has not clearly appeared so far in his statement.

Mr. CATCHINGS. What I meant to say I will put in the form of an illustration. In 1890, for instance, we had before us certain work which was to be done in the harbor of Philadelphia, which, as I now recollect, was to cost something like $3,000,000, though I may be in error as to that.

Mr. REYBURN. That is correct.

Mr. CATCHINGS. We appropriated in the bill of 1890, $200,000 for the continuation of that work; and at the same time we provided that the Secretary of War might make contracts for the whole amount required to complete that work, the contractor, however, to wait for payment out of future appropriations. That system enables the contractor to go ahead with the work from one year to another, and with the knowledge that he will be allowed to do the whole work. He therefore arranges his plant with a view to completing the whole work, instead of a part only as under the old system.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his explanation.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield now for a motion that the committee rise? It is now nearly 5 o'clock.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LESTER, from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 5575), the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (H. R. 4956) directing the coinage of the silver bullion held in the Treasury, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent to publish with my remarks in the RECORD a statement of one of the consulting engineers with reference to the work at Omaha.

There was no objection.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MCKAIG, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, papers in the case of John T. Vincent, Fifty-second Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. COVERT, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. HEPBURN, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. ALLEN, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SICKLES, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. JONES, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PICKLER, for the session of this evening, on account of important business.

To Mr. CLARKE of Alabama, for the evening session.
To Mr. COBB of Alabama, for the evening session.
To Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, for one day, on account of important business.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE CALUMET RIVER.

Mr. WISE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 1424) to amend section 8 of an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Calumet River, approved March 1, 1893, be recommitted to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the House now take its recess until 8 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the recess will be taken now instead of waiting until 5 o'clock. The evening session will be devoted to business under the rule for Friday nights. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] will perform the duties of the chair. The House will now takes its recess till 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. BROOKSHIRE, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read clause 3, of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. The House shall, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, which evening session shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills reported from the Committee on Pensions, and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, under the rule just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois in the chair.

ADDISON M. COPEN.

The first business in order was the bill (H. R. 1868) for the relief of Addison M. Copen.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Unless the gentleman in charge of this bill is here, I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, last Friday night, when I was unavoidably absent, a bill which I had introduced was laid aside. I ask unanimous consent that I may bring it up now.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Let me say to my friend from Arkansas that, while I shall not interpose an absolute objection to this request, I do not believe it is best to begin to take up bills by preference——

Mr. TERRY. I would state to my friend from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] that he perhaps does not understand the attitude of this case. It was reached at the last Friday night session and owing to my unavoidable absence it had to be laid aside.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. What bill is it?

Mr. TERRY. It is the bill H. R. 2561, reported from the Committee on Pensions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Arkansas that he is informed by the Clerk that the bill is likely to be reached in its regular order.

Mr. STALLINGS. We did not do any work last Friday night because the point of no quorum was made. I think it would be better to have the regular order.

Mr. TERRY. If the bill is likely to be reached, I will not press my request that it be taken up out of its order.

DOLLIE E. VEDDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4320) for the relief of Dollie E. Vedder.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Dollie E. Vedder, widow of the late Capt. Simon C. Vedder, of the Nineteenth Regiment, United States Army, on the pension roll, at the rate of $30 per month, in lieu of the amount she now receives.

Mr. STALLINGS. I call for the reading of the report on that bill.

The report (by Mr. MOSES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4320) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Dollie E. Vedder, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

Mrs. Vedder is the widow of the late Simon C. Vedder, who at the time of his death, December 5, 1892, was a captain of infantry on the retired list.

The soldier was appointed captain of volunteers on June 22, 1864, and before his muster out on June 14, 1865, attained the rank of brevet major United States Volunteers. During his volunteer service he was stationed at Alexandria, Va.

Mr. Vedder accepted appointment as second lieutenant Twenty-eighth United States Infantry April 11, 1867, and was promoted to be first lieutenant Nineteenth Infantry on March 18, 1878. He was retired from active service February 20, 1891, as a captain of infantry, on account of disability from organic disease of heart arising in line of duty.

Capt. Vedder served with his regiment in Arkansas, Colorado, and Louisiana; on signal duty at Fort Whipple, Va.; in charge of military telegraph lines in New Mexico; with his regiment in Washington Territory and in Kansas, and finally in charge of the construction of public buildings at San Antonio, Tex.

Mrs. Vedder married the soldier on November 25, 1863, and has remained his widow since his death. On December 10, 1892, she filed an application at the Pension Bureau, which was allowed January 18, 1893, at $17 per month, that being the rate allowed by the general laws to the widow of a first lieutenant.

It is reliably shown in the testimony which was filed with the bill that Mrs. Vedder is in delicate health, with but little, if any, means of support aside from her small pension, and that what little means she had were used in paying off her husband's debts.

In view of the soldier's long and arduous services, and in the light of the widow's necessitous circumstances, the passage of the bill is recommended, with an amendment fixing the rate of pension at $25 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the committee that this bill was amended in the Committee of the Whole last Friday night, as the Chair is informed, and the amount was reduced to $20 per month. The question now is upon laying aside the bill as amended with a favorable recommendation.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MOSES W. CARPENTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 2561) for the relief of Moses W. Carpenter, of Johnson County, Ark., Mexican war veteran.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Moses W. Carpenter, of Johnson County, Ark., Mexican war veteran, at $15 a month.

The report (by Mr. MOSES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2561) increasing the pension of Moses W. Carpenter, have had the same under consideration and respectfully report as follows:

Mr. Carpenter served from June 30, 1846, to September 15, 1846, in Company C, First Arkansas Mounted Volunteers, Mexican war, and he is now receiving a pension at $8 per month on account of said service.

The testimony accompanying the bill shows that Mr. Carpenter is 77 years old, unable to labor, and in great need. He and his invalid wife are living alone, and have no children to whom they can look for support.

In the light of the foregoing facts your committee believe that the bill is a meritorious one and its passage is recommended with an amendment, striking out the word "fifteen," in line 7, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "twelve;" so as to allow a pension of $12 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment reported by the Clerk was agreed to last Friday evening, as the Chair understands.

Mr. TERRY. I desire to state in that connection that the bill was reported to the last Congress by the committee, who thoroughly examined into the matter, at $15 per month. I think it is a case the circumstances of which entitle the man to $15. He is now verging on 80 years of age. I believe it is stated that he is 77. He is really older than that, and he is in a helpless condition. He has an invalid wife, who is unable to dress herself, and these two old people live there by themselves, and have no property, real or personal. I understand the neighbors often have to go there and look after them. Fifteen dollars a month is a very small amount in such a case, and I think that the chairman of the committee which reported the bill is perfectly willing that it should pass at $15 per month. I hope that amount will stand.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Is this man a survivor of the Mexican war or of the Indian war?

Mr. TERRY. The Mexican war. He served in a regiment of mounted volunteers, from Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] understand that the Committee of the Whole on last Friday night adopted an amendment reducing the amount to $12 per month?

Mr. TERRY. No; I understood on last Friday night the committee laid the bill aside.

The CHAIRMAN. That was done after the amendment which reduces the amount to $12 had been agreed to. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the bill was amended, and the RECORD shows that it was. By that amendment the amount was reduced to $12 per month. The question now is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation, as amended. On last Friday night objection was raised, and it was passed over in that condition.

Mr. TERRY. I would move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; but I suppose that can not be done in Committee of the Whole. It might be done by unanimous consent, and I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. STALLINGS. As I understand, by the amendment which we adopted we fixed the amount in the committee at $12 per month. Is there not a general law on the statute books which will allow that man $12 per month as a Mexican veteran?

Mr. TERRY. I understand that he might make application and get $12 per month; but I think that $15 is small enough under the circumstances. It might take the man five or six months, in the present crowded state of affairs in the Pension Office, to get his claim allowed in that way if he should make application now. I do not think $12 is a sufficient sum under the circumstances.

Mr. STALLINGS. I would like to state to my friend that I got a bill through in three weeks.

Mr. TERRY. You are a rapid man.

Mr. STALLINGS. You ought to be just as rapid.

Mr. TERRY. I can not do as well as that without a better start.

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not see why this bill should pass here. There is a statute which gives this man $12 a month already.

Mr. TERRY. I submit that under the circumstances of this case $12 is not a sufficient sum, because this man is very old——

Mr. STALLINGS. But the Committee of the Whole did not seem to agree with the gentleman.

Mr. TERRY. This man is in a helpless condition, and so is his wife. They have no property whatever, and under the testimony I think if there is any case in which a man ought to have $15, this is such a case. I ask unanimous consent that the amount in the bill be fixed at $15.

Mr. STALLINGS. As I understand, the committee have already recommended $12 per month.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee on Pensions recommend $12 per month.

Mr. STALLINGS. I mean the Committee of the Whole. I understand that there has been an amendment agreed to by the Committee of the Whole fixing the amount at $12 per month. I understand that was done at the last Friday night session.

The CHAIRMAN. In the first instance the Committee on Pensions recommend an amendment striking out "$15" and inserting "$12," and that amendment was agreed to in the Committee of the Whole last Friday night.

Mr. STALLINGS. That is what I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] asks unanimous consent to substitute $15 instead of $12.

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Chairman, I can not give unanimous consent to the passage of a bill here when there is already a statute on the books which provides for the very thing that this bill provides for.

The CHAIRMAN. A mere objection is sufficient to prevent unanimous consent.

Mr. TERRY. I ask for $15. There is no statute that allows that.

Mr. STALLINGS. We are not going to let you get $15.

Mr. TERRY. That is what I want to get, and if we can get back to that point then we will see whether the House will let me have it.

Mr. STALLINGS. I will say to the gentleman that this Mexican war veteran in your district is no more needy than the Mexican war veteran who resides in my State, for whom I got $12.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS]. The question is on laying aside the bill as amended, with a favorable recommendation. In the absence of objection, it will be done.

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not consent to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WASHINGTON HISLOP.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5020) granting a pension to Washington Hislop.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Washington Hislop, late of the Marengo Light Guards, Indiana Legion, the said Hislop having received injuries in the Morgan raid.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Legion," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the words "at a rate proportionate to the degree of disability from such gunshot wound of the forehead as may be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior to have been incurred in an engagement with the enemy during the Morgan raid."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I ask if that is not a claim that comes over from last Friday night?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill was considered last Friday night.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. As I remember, it is the claim of a man who received a wound during Morgan's raid through his country, and who was never in the regular service. He was just called out to meet Morgan's men, and he was hurt by his horse falling down, or he was dodging in the bushes and a stray bullet hit him, or something of that sort.

Mr. Chairman, that claim, I think, was decided upon last Friday evening, when the committee agreed to report the bill unfavorably, and I think that they did right. I therefore move that the committee make an unfavorable report on that claim.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from South Carolina will yield to me——

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Certainly, sir.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I will state that this bill was up for consideration on Friday night last, and would have been reported favorably had the point of no quorum not been made. The gentleman who introduced the bill is not present to-night.

Mr. STALLINGS. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me, I think I made objection, and the bill went over without prejudice and it was laid aside; and Mr. BRETZ asked me to let it go over until he came back from Indiana.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. But my colleague came to me to-day and asked me to present it at this evening's session.

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not think that it ought to go through.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Why not?

Mr. STALLINGS. I think the point of no quorum was made.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. That is just what I was saying.

Mr. STALLINGS And the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] was asked to withdraw it.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I do not think there was any evidence to prove that this man was really in an engagement against Morgan's men. It seems to me that the evidence was uncertain, and nobody could tell where he was, and what he was doing, or whether he was shot in the head or somewhere else.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. The bill was in the course of consideration when it was suggested that we were going beyond the line of precedents. I have a bunch of bills before me here to-night, running back for some years, showing that it is directly within the line of precedents; and all that this bill proposes to do is this, to give the man a chance to prove that he was injured in a pensionable degree in the engagement with Morgan's men. If he can not do that he gets nothing. If he can, he will get what he would be entitled to under the general law. It is a case of gunshot wound received in actual battle; and let me say to my friend from South Carolina that it is not a new departure at all. It has been the rule of this committee from year to year where a man was injured in battle, wounded in battle, to give him the pension to which he would be entitled.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. But it seems that this man was not wounded in battle. He did not belong to any arm of the service at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. He belonged to the Indiana Legion.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. It seemed that Morgan passed through that country, and he seems to have been shot somehow; possibly trying to get away.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Somebody was liable to get shot while Morgan was around.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. He belonged to the Indiana Legion, a regular military organization of that State, but not mustered into the service of the United States. He was called out as a member of that organization and was actually wounded in battle; and all this bill proposes to do is to give him a chance to make that proof.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. But it seems that he did not go to the battle. Possibly the battle came to him.

A MEMBER. I have had the battle come to me.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. It reached him all the same.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. He was shot in the head, all the same.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I think that this is a case that ought not to pass.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. If my friend will permit me, there is a very large number of precedents which, as the lawyers say, are on all fours with this case.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then they are very bad ones, I think.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. When a man belongs to a military organization of a State, and where a military force was invading the State, as Morgan's force was coming into Indiana, and he volunteered his services in this military organization to resist the incoming of troops and destruction of property and everything of that sort, and was injured, it seems to me that he ought to be pensioned.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. There is no evidence to show whether he shot himself or was shot by anybody, or hurt himself in endeavoring to get away.

Mr. BKOOKSHIRE. But this is to give the man an opportunity to show whether he was wounded in battle.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Is that the whole object of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Is he simply asking the right to apply?

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Then he ought to have the opportunity to show that he has a right to apply. The trouble is they might give it to him, and he ought not to have it.

Mr. STALLINGS. Does the evidence in this case show how long this man served when he was in the militia? I believe he never was in the regular Army.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. It is a case of a citizen who belonged to this Indiana Legion, who were organized for the purpose of protecting the homes of the citizens there.

Mr. STALLINGS. I understand that full well; but how long did he serve in that legion?

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. If there had been no invading army he perhaps would not have been called into engagement at all.

Mr. STALLINGS. Now, let me ask you this further question: Did you propose to put him in this bill as if he had served in the army of the United States? Now, under the act of 1890 he could not draw a pension unless he served ninety days.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. No.

Mr. STALLINGS. Then, how can he obtain pension?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Let me say this, if you will permit——

Mr. STALLINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. If he had been in the Federal service, if he had served only fifteen minutes he would have been entitled to a pension.

Mr. STALLINGS. I know that. Does this bill put this man under the act of 1890?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. SWANSON. Why did he not prove his claim under the act of 1874, under which those who were wounded in the service could make the proof; and if they could make the proof that they were wounded they were entitled to pension?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I think not. So far as my experience goes in Congress—and it has not been very long, as this is only the third term—all these Indiana militia who have come in at all came in simply upon the ground that they were wounded in battle, and upon no other ground. Now the Committee on Invalid Pensions have brought it down to this fine point, for we do not give a man a pension of $6, $8, $10, or $12, or any other amount, but we simply give him a chance to prove that he was actually wounded; to prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior and the Bureau of Pensions that he was actually wounded in battle with the enemy to a pensionable degree.

Mr. HULICK. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana by what rule they would determine the rate of pension this man would receive? Would it be under the act of 1890, limited to $12?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. HULICK. Would it be limited by any law?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It would not be limited at all excepting by general law.

Mr. HULICK. Then he might be so wounded as to receive $72 a month.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. He might; but there is no such probability.

Mr. STALLINGS. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to withdraw this bill and let it go over until the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] returns?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] submitted this matter to me this morning, and asked me to call it before the House to-night and to ask that it be passed.

Mr. STALLINGS. I have no objection to the gentleman calling it up, but I think it would be best to pass it over without prejudice. I objected to it.

Mr. DANIELS. The instance referred to by the gentleman from South Carolina as being similar to this bill was a bill merely allowing persons who were in the Indian war in Oregon to be placed upon the pension roll, and the party was in the volunteer service of the State or Territory when he was wounded.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I do not hear the gentleman.

Mr. DANIELS. The party referred to was in the service of the Territory or State of Oregon, and was wounded in the Indian war, and he was allowed to be put upon the pension roll, or his application was authorized, just as in the case of this man, and certainly that is a decided precedent for the case of this applicant.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Why, certainly.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I will ask if this claim is upon the Calendar?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. What is the number on the Calendar?

Mr. ELLIS of Oregon. It is No. 93 on the Calendar, page 14.

Mr. SWANSON. What has been the legislation with regard to those men who were not mustered into the Army?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It has been in line with this.

Mr. SWANSON. That they have been given pensions only by special legislation?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. By special legislation.

Mr. SWANSON. There has never been any general statute allowing people who were not mustered into the Army, but who were in the militia, to draw pensions?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I do not want to answer that question broadly in the negative, but within my present recollection there has not been any such general legislation.

Mr. SWANSON. I was informed that there was a general law by which they were given the privilege up to 1874 of coming in and obtaining pensions.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. That referred to the Missouri militia.

Mr. DANIELS. The early soldiers of the Revolutionary war were not regularly mustered in, yet they received pensions.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The question being taken on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STALLINGS. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 4.

Mr. STALLINGS. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will appoint to act as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS].

The tellers took their places, but before the count began,

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, by unanimous consent I will withdraw this bill on account of the absence of my colleague from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ], with the understanding that the bill shall be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw the point of no quorum?

Mr. STALLINGS. If the gentleman withdraws the bill I do. I would state, Mr. Chairman, in connection with this bill, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] told me that he was going home; that there were some facts in connection with this case that he would collect while he was there, and would bring them back and let me see them, and I told him that if he did that I would be perfectly satisfied; and the bill went over in that way.

MARILLA TENNEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1713) granting a pension to Marilla Tenney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of Marilla Tenney, as widow of Elisha C. Tenney, late a private in Company A of the Forty-seventh Regiment of Iowa Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

Mr. LANE. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. LACEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1713) granting a pension to Marilla Tenney, submit the following report:

Marilla Tenney is the widow of Elisha C. Tenney, late a private in Company A, Forty-seventh Iowa Infantry, who served as such soldier from March 11, 1864, to September 23, 1864, when he was honorably mustered out of service with his company, as shown by discharge paper on file.

This claimant, the widow of said soldier, can not receive relief through the Pension Bureau for the reason that she is unable to prove absolutely the date or fact of her late husband's death.

The evidence is conclusive, consisting of affidavits of numerous neighbors and acquaintances, that this soldier left his home at Volga City, Iowa, in 1879, and went to the Black Hills country in Dakota to look for work. Securing work, he wrote frequently to his family and sent money regularly for their support until 1882, when his letters ceased, and said soldier has not been heard from since, except by a mere rumor that he was dead. This claimant, as well as her friends, has made every effort to learn of his whereabouts if living, but to no purpose. Letters have been dispatched to all the post-offices of the Black Hills country, but no news of him has been secured. The family then communicated with the Pension Bureau to ascertain if said soldier had ever made application for a pension, but no such application has ever been filed to the present time.

Thus, by every possible means, this claimant has endeavored to ascertain if her late husband were living, but has been compelled to accept his death as certain. The common law presumes death under such conditions, but the Pension Bureau requires very positive proof in such cases.

It is also conclusively shown that this claimant is wholly dependent on her own labor for support. Many of the soldier's letters and the marriage certificate are on file.

Your committee therefore report the bill with the recommendation that it be amended by striking out the word "twelve," in the eighth line of said bill and inserting in its stead the word "eight," so that it shall read "$8 per month," and, as so amended, that the bill pass.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee report that bill unfavorably. It was up on last Friday night, and I took the ground that it was a bad precedent to make a favorable report on such a bill.

Mr. STALLINGS. I think the gentleman from South Carolina is mistaken about this case. I think we made a favorable report upon the bill, with the amendment providing that if the husband should be found to be alive, then the pension to the wife should cease.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Well, I think we had better kill it certainly this time, so that it will not get alive again.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I think there was an amendment adopted to that bill on last Friday evening, providing that the pension should cease if it should be discovered that the husband was alive. I think that amendment was adopted on the suggestion of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MARTIN of Indiana].

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in order that there may be no mistake about it, I move to add at the close of the bill a provision that if the husband shall be found to be alive, this pension shall at once cease.

Mr. COX. I do not think that is necessary. If he had been alive he would have been on the pension roll long ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Well, Mr. Chairman, let the committee vote down my amendment, if they think proper.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying this bill aside with the recommendation that it do pass. [A pause.]

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it, and the bill is laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The demand comes too late. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I asked for a division in time. I claim that I was in time, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman did not rise and call for a division until after the Chair announced the result and declared the bill laid aside.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Well, I will be in time the next time. [Laughter.]

Mr. STALLINGS. I rose before the division was called for, but was not recognized by the Chair. I simply wished to ask whether the amendment adopted last Friday night is in the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment reducing the amount to $8 a month.

Mr. STALLINGS. There was, I think, another amendment providing that the pension to the wife should cease in case the husband was found to be alive.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that that is not in the bill.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. It can be put in by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment about which the gentleman from Alabama asks was not in the bill when it was laid aside. There is only one amendment, the one reducing the pension to $8.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN], providing that in the event of the husband being found alive the pension to the wife shall cease, be inserted in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection the amendment will be inserted.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina objects.

W. H. COHORN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 479) to relieve W. H. Cohorn from the charge of desertion.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the charge of desertion now appearing against W. H. Cohorn is hereby removed, and the said W. H. Cohorn be, and is hereby, relieved from the charge of desertion; and that he be, and is hereby, restored to all rights to which he would have been entitled had he never deserted and as if no record showing desertion had been made.

Mr. LANE. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. BOWERS of California) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 479) to relieve W. H. Cohorn from the charge of desertion, have had the same under consideration, and find that the report of the War Department, which is submitted herewith, shows most conclusively that this bill ought to pass; that the soldier was in no respect guilty of the charge of desertion as marked on the rolls of the company at one time; that he was sick and in hospital with leave, on furlough; that he returned to his regiment as soon as he was able to do so, and sooner; that he served with his company, and was honorably mustered out with his company at the expiration of the time of his enlistment. His commanding officer, the colonel of the regiment, testifies that the soldier was not in any fault.

Your committee, therefore, recommend that the bill do pass, with the following amendment:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or emoluments of any kind shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this bill."

Case of W. H. Cohorn.

RECORD AND PENSION OFFICE,
War Department, October 6, 1893.

William H. Cohorn was enrolled as a private in Company F, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, to serve three years, and mustered into service July 7, 1862, and appears to have been present with his command or otherwise properly accounted for up to October 31, 1862, when he is reported "absent," without remark. The roll for November and December, 1862, reports him "deserted November 12, 1862, from Paris, Ky.," and his name is dropped from succeeding rolls to April 30, 1864, when he is reported "absent sick at Chattanooga, Tenn., gained from desertion, stop $30 for apprehension."

Subsequent to the date mentioned he is reported on rolls as follows: May and June, 1864, "absent sick, Chattanooga, Tenn., a deserter"; July and August, 1864, "present awaiting court-martial"; September and October, 1864, "absent awaiting court-martial, sick at Atlanta"; November and December, 1864, "absent sick at Louisville since October 3, 1864, awaiting court-martial"; and he is so reported on the succeeding roll, dated February 28, 1865; rolls for March and April and May and June, 1865, report him "present awaiting court-martial."

The company muster-out roll, dated July 13, 1865, shows him mustered out of service with the organization on that date; remark, "deserted October 10, 1862, returned to duty March 24, 1864—charges preferred for desertion, awaiting trial."

Other records show him, "deserted December —, 1862, at Paris, Ky.; arrested March 15, 1864, by provost-marshal, seventh district, Kentucky, and delivered same date at military post, Lexington, Ky."

Following is a copy of the charge of desertion preferred against him by Lieut. John M. Poston, of Company F, as shown by company and regimental books:

"CHARGE I.—Desertion.

"Specification 1.—In this, that he did on or about the 1st day of November, 1862, while camped at or near Paris, Ky., absent himself without leave by proper authority, and did remain absent until he was arrested and returned to his regiment at Nashville, Tenn., on or about the 28th day of March, 1864."

The records do not furnish any evidence of the soldier's trial on this charge or of his restoration to duty.

The medical records report him as follows: As William Cohorn, private, Company F, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, admitted to general field hospital, Chattanooga, Tenn., April 9, 1863, with mumps, and transferred May 4, 1864; admitted to No. 3 general hospital, Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga, Tenn., July 1, 1864, with syphilis, and returned to duty August 3, 1864, as —— Cohorn (rank not stated), Company F, Eighteenth Kentucky, treated in regimental hospital September 20 to October 3, 1864, (diagnosis not shown), and transferred to hospital at Atlanta October 3, 1864, as William Cohorn, private, Company F, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, admitted to Cumberland general hospital, Nashville, Tenn., November 2, 1864, with pneumonia, and transferred November 10, 1864, and admitted to Joe Holt general hospital, Jeffersonville, Ind., November 11, 1864, with secondary syphilis, and returned to duty November 24, 1864.

There is no evidence of his having been granted a furlough at any period of his term of enlistment.

Under date August 12, 1883, the soldier made application for removal of the charge of desertion under the provisions of the act of August 7, 1882, and on the 24th October following was called upon for a statement under oath giving the authority under which he left his command and his whereabouts during his absence.

On the 28th October, 1884, he submitted the following testimony:

In an affidavit bearing the above date, the soldier stated that in October, 1862, while in the service of the United States, he was taken sick and was sent home on sick furlough by Capt. Littlejohn, and that he remained at home sick until March, 1864, when he returned to his regiment, though still in bad health, and reported to Capt. Posten, who was then captain of his company; that he was thereupon sent to hospital and remained there about two months and was then sent to the convalescent camp, where he remained three or four months, and was then sent back to his regiment and returned to duty, remaining with his command until he was discharged. He further stated that he was furloughed "until fit for duty," but returned to his regiment before he was fit for duty, and declares that during his absence from his command he was at home sick and confined to his bed "nearly all the time."

David Trout, in an affidavit made the same day, stated that he knew the soldier at the time he enlisted; that he came home in the fall of 1862 on sick furlough, and that as he, affiant, lived close to him, he "went after Drs. Ford and Green for him," and visited him often during his sickness; that Drs. Green and Ford gave him up to die; and he was then treated by Dr. Prior, under whose care he improved somewhat so as to be able to go about; that in the spring of 1864, he returned to the Army, although he had not recovered, and "looked badly;" that prior to his enlistment he was a sound, healthy man, but that since his discharge he had had frequent spells of sickness. Affiant added that he had never heard of claimant's deserting, and that he went back of his own accord before he was well; and that he had never heard of any person coming after him.

In an affidavit, of same date, Windle Trout declared that he was acquainted with the applicant at the time of his enlistment and recollected his coming home on sick furlough in the fall of 1862; that on the night of his return he, affiant, went for the soldier's brother to come and wait on him; that the soldier continued sick all the winter, confined to his bed most of the time, affiant being with him for the most part during the whole winter, engaged in cutting and hauling wood, making fires and waiting upon him, at which time claimant was under the care of Drs. Green, Ford, and Prior; and that he returned to his regiment in the spring of 1864, though not then entirely well. Affiant further declared that he never heard of claimant's being a deserter, and stated that he returned to his regiment of his own accord, and before he had recovered; that he never heard of any person coming after him; and that he had not got entirely well at date of affiant's statement.

Henry I. Newton, in an affidavit of same date, stated that he was acquainted with Cohorn at the time of his enlistment; that the soldier came home in the fall of 1862 on sick furlough, and remained at home for a considerable time, sick in bed a greater part of the time; that he, affiant, was at claimant's house frequently, and knew that he was at home sick until the spring of 1864, when he returned to his regiment, though not well; and that he never heard of Cohorn's deserting, or of any person coming for him or looking after him as a deserter.

Under date September 28, 1885, the applicant was informed that the provisions of the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, did not cover his case, inasmuch as he did not voluntarily return to his command.

On the 18th of February, 1886, Hon. WILLIAM C. P. BRECKINRIDGE addressed the Deparment, requesting to be informed as to the status of Cohorn's application, and on the 27th of the same month was informed that in view of the fact that the soldier did not voluntarily return to his command, but was arrested, his case did not come within the provisions of the act of July 5, 1884, and that as it was held by the Department that the charge of desertion was not erroneously made there was no provision of law under which it could be removed.

Under date April 12, 1886, Mr. BRECKINRIDGE transmitted the following additional testimony in support of the soldier's application:

The claimant, in an affidavit dated March 24, 1886, declared that he was furloughed October, 1862, on account of sickness, being unfit for duty; that he reported to his command in March, 1864, at Nashville, Tenn., and upon examination, being still found unfit for duty, was returned to the hospital at Chattanooga. He further stated that the furlough granted him was issued by Capt. Littlejohn and was without limit, and that upon his return to his command Capt. Littlejohn had resigned and been succeeded by Capt. John Postin; and he declared that he returned to his command voluntarily and without orders or arrest.

David Trout, a former affiant, in an affidavit dated March 24, 1886, stated that Cohorn was not arrested as a deserter, but returned to his command of his own free will, and that he appeared anxious to go, saying he wanted to fight for his country.

Wendle Trout, a former affiant, in an affidavit made April 2, 1886, gave testimony identical with that of David Trout, last preceding.

Henry J. Newton, a former affiant, in an affidavit made March 23, 1886, declared that the claimant was furloughed by Capt. William Littlejohn, at Paris, in October, 1862, and that he voluntarily returned to his command at Nashville, in March, 1864.

William B. Newton, in an affidavit dated March 24, 1886, stated that claimant returned to his command voluntarily.

Dr. William Pryor, in an affidavit executed March 24, 1886, stated that in 1862 he treated the claimant as a furloughed soldier of Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry, and continued to treat him from October, 1862, to March, 1864, when he returned to his command, taking with him a statement that he was not able for duty. He added that the soldier's furlough was signed by Capt. William Littlejohn, Paris, Ky., and that his return to his command was voluntary.

Under date December 20, 1886, Hon. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE was informed, with reference to the application of Cohorn, that the official records showed that the soldier deserted October 10, 1862, and was arrested March 15, 1864, by the provost marshal of the seventh district of Kentucky, and inasmuch as he did not voluntarily return, but was arrested, his case did not come within the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 5, 1884, and that it had been decided that no relief could be granted in the case under existing laws, on the testimony presented.

Under date March 26, 1887, Col. John B. Castleman, acting adjutant-general State of Kentucky, addressed the Department on behalf of Cohorn, stating that Col. H. K. Milward, who commanded the Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry, of which Cohorn was a member, requested that the latter be given an opportunity to prove that the charge of desertion in his case was unjust and incorrect.

Mr. Cohorn, Col. Castleman proceeded to state, was absent on a furlough granted for an indefinite period by Capt. W. H. Littlejohn at Paris, Ky., October 10, 1862, and upon his return found Capt. John M. Poston in command. Cohorn stated that he was in poor health during his absence, and when sufficiently improved reported to Provost-Marshal Long, at Georgetown, Ky., of his own accord—not having been arrested—showed his furlough, and on that was given transportation to his regiment; that upon his return, March 24, 1864, he was at once ordered by his regimental surgeon, Dr. Pythian, to the hospital at Summerville, Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga, Tenn., and stayed there two months, after which he was ordered to convalescent camp, where he remained about a month, and was then given transportation to his regiment and assigned to duty; that the captain who gave him his furlough resigned in his absence, without having explained the cause of his absence, and that he never received a trial, but was granted an honorable discharge.

On the 9th April, 1887, the adjutant-general of the State of Kentucky was informed, with reference to this case, that the charge of desertion against Cohorn had not been removed and could not be removed from his record under then existing laws.

In a communication to Hon. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, dated February 4, 1892, referred to this Department by him, the applicant stated that he was enrolled and mustered into service July 7, 1862, as a private in Company F, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, to serve three years, and was mustered out of service at Louisville, Ky., July 18, 1865.

The status of the case has not been changed since the date claimant's application was last denied, no new testimony having been submitted or legislation had warranting a reversal of such adverse decision.

Very respectfully,

F. C. AINSWORTH,
Colonel, United States Army, Chief of Office.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move that bill be laid aside to be reported adversely to the House.

Mr. McKEIGHAN. Mr. Chairman, being somewhat familiar with the circumstances, often beyond the control of the soldier, which places him on the records of the War Department with a stain on his name, I feel that in justice to my comrades living and dead and their families, I ought to rise here and now and protest against this motion. Everyone at all familiar with a soldier's life knows that from time to time when the military organization to which he belongs is ordered to move, he may be sick in the hospital, or he may have been examined by a physician and sent to the rear, and the comrades of his company having no knowledge of his whereabouts; that night he is reported as absent without leave, and a few more days of such reports and he is marked on the roll of his company as a deserter.

If any gentleman will examine the records of the War Department, as prepared and kept in admirable shape by Col. Ainsworth, he will find a charge of desertion standing against a large number of men who never hesitated to serve their country and who never turned their backs on the foes of this Government. Familiar as I am with the circumstances that surround many of these cases, I rise here to-night and in the name of my comrades and for the honor of this country, I say I do not believe that motions like these would be backed by the men who wore the gray and met us on the field of honorable battle.

I am here to say that there is too much chivalry; that there is too much of the spirit of the soldier, even in the men who bore arms against this Government, for them to be guilty of insisting on leaving a stain on the character of any man who served this Government when it is shown positively and conclusively that he never did desert. I trust that this motion will be voted down, as it ought to be, and that gentlemen will cease to come here and in a spirit of petulance stand on this floor and cavil about granting petty pensions of seven or eight or ten dollars a month, while they vote liberally, as this Congress does vote, extra salaries to clerks and an extra month's pay to the employés of this House—to which I do not object—and millions to rivers and harbors simply because there is a job for some fellow at the bottom of nearly all of it.

These men who receive the bounty of this Government in the form of pensions never "whack up," if the committee will pardon a common expression, and consequently it is a popular thing to come in here and assail men who are defenseless, if, forsooth, this committee will listen to gentlemen who seem so anxious to make a reputation by saving a dollar where that dollar is justly due, and at the same time so anxious to leave a stain on the name of a man who never did violate the military law of his country. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to say more on this subject at this time, and I could not well say less. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I say in a spirit of fairness and justice, in reply to what the gentleman has just said, that I happened to be one of those men who wore the gray——

Mr. McKEIGHAN. So much the worse for the gray.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. And I happened to be one of those who met the men who wore the blue; and since the war has closed I have been in organizations and meetings and conventions where the men who wore the gray and the men who wore the blue met together—men who had opposed each other in the red blaze of battle, stood with clasped hands stretched across the bloody chasm in order to bury the bloody shirt, with the prayer upon their lips that upon the grave might be planted the white lily of peace, which would grow and bring forth fruit to the upbuilding and the prosperity of this great country of ours.

And I will say to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McKEIGHAN] that I stood here and voted against the extra pay and the extra mileage. My vote is recorded against those propositions. I have raised my voice against every appropriation that I thought was unnecessary. And I throw back in the teeth of the gentleman any insinuation that he may throw at me of attempting to make a little reputation by bringing up motions in opposition to these claims.

I would like to call the attention of the gentleman to a speech that was made by Gen. Bragg, of Wisconsin, the commander of the "Iron Brigade," upon this very question of pensions—a speech made in this Hall, in which, if I mistake not, he said that in 1865, or just about the time the war was closing, there were over 200,000 men mustered into the service from the grog-shops and from the jails—bounty-jumpers and substitutes for men who did not want to go into the war—and that 13,000 or 14,000 of those men were deserters and ought to be hanged. Yet they are drawing pensions to-day!

I stand here to say that I am willing to cast my vote openly and above board for any honest soldier, any brave man who met me and my comrades in battle and fought like an honest, brave man; but I am opposed to giving a pension to a deserter, a bummer, or camp-follower, or any man of that description; and every other brave man must be in favor of this position, and will vote against any such proposition.

That, Mr. Chairman, is why I have made the motion to report unfavorably upon this deserter's claim. I insist upon the motion; and I will see that it does not get through without the vote of a majority. If the gentleman from Nebraska, or whatever other State he may be from, does not like this he can make the most of it.

Mr. McKEIGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to this House that I made no such charge personally against the gentleman as he assumes that I made. I did say that this House has been liberal. But now if it comes to a question of a deserter drawing a pension, I challenge the gentleman to produce a single case where any deserter in this country is drawing a pension.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I can produce the speech that Gen. Bragg made upon the floor of this House in which he said that there were thirteen or fourteen thousand of them. And here is a case of a deserter that you are standing here to defend to-night.

Mr. McKEIGHAN. I say it is no such thing. I am here to say that I made no such charge against the gentleman personally; and it is very cheap bravery that vents itself in florid oratory on the floor of this House because I have asserted that Congress has been liberal. I want to say here and now that I have never turned my back on a friend or a foe and I do not intend to do it now. [Applause.] I am here to denounce the spirit that leads a man on the floor of this House to assail every old soldier, even to the extent of preventing men from having the stain of desertion removed, when the Committee on Military Affairs composed of members as honest and intelligent as the gentleman have said that there is no question about the justice of removing this stain.

Now, it may be that men have "shaken hands across the bloody chasm," and that they are very desirous to see the "white lily of peace" bloom. For myself it shall never bloom so long as you stab the defenders of my country. [Applause.]

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I want to say that I deny any such charge; and if the gentleman means to say I have "stabbed" any old soldier or anything of that sort, I say it is utterly false.

Mr. McKEIGHAN. I want to say if the shoe fits the gentleman he will have to wear it. He seems to insist on wearing it. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I wish to ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] a question.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. What is your objection to this bill? It involves no pension, no bounty, no back pay.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Well, I have stated my objection in the few remarks that I have made—that there is a charge of desertion resting here against this man and I am opposed to giving any deserter a pension.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. This is not a bill to pension him at all, but simply to wipe out this stain on his record.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. It will lead to a pension, and that is the object.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. The object is simply to get in an entering wedge. When you make this start there will be no stopping it.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Now, I ask the Clerk to read as a part of my remarks the amendment which has been reported by the committee, and as I understand adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STALLINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question, if it will not interrupt him.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. STALLINGS. Is it not a fact that when a man has a good case of this sort there is a general law under which he can go to the War Department and have the charge against him removed?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Oh, yes.

Mr. STALLINGS. Then why does not this man do it?

Mr. LACEY. The difficulty in this case——

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not believe in passing special laws of this kind when we have a general law on the statute book that covers such cases.

Mr. LACEY. The report shows formal proceedings against this man by court-martial; and they can not be wiped out by an order of the War Department. The committee of this House has made an examination of the case, going through the evidence given before the court-martial and also the additional evidence furnished to the committee; and they believe the decision against the soldier was erroneous. They simply propose to strike from the record the charge of desertion. The man already holds an honorable discharge. This does not change his status in any respect except in removing from his record what appears to the committee to be an unjust charge.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. What will prevent this man from applying for a pension after this charge of desertion is removed?

Mr. LACEY. There is nothing now to prevent him from applying for a pension. He has an honorable discharge. He may be a pensioner, for all I know.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. He may be one of those 13,000 of the "iron brigade."

Mr. LACEY. Perhaps he is the whole 13,000. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANE. The gentleman states, as I understand, that this man has now an honorable discharge. Does not that clear his record?

Mr. LACEY. But this conviction by a court-martial leaves a blemish upon him. Back of his honorable discharge there is still this charge against him—a blight on his record. He wants to have that removed, and he has come before the Committee on Military Affairs for that purpose.

Mr. HUDSON. He is somewhat in the same position that Fitz-John Porter was.

Mr. STALLINGS. I would like to know why the honorable discharge does not clear his record. I understand that the soldier already has an honorable discharge from the Army?

Mr. LACEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. STALLINGS. You do not know whether he draws a pension or not; but that is not the question.

Mr. LACEY. There is nothing to prevent his doing so at any rate.

Mr. STALLINGS. Has not this honorable discharge from the Army wiped out the stain upon his record?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. It stands there upon the judgment of the court-martial.

Mr. STALLINGS. Then how can Congress wipe it out? We do not know more about the matter than the officers that sat upon the court-martial.

Mr. LACEY. We do, for this reason——

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. How can we go behind the "returning board?"

Mr. LACEY. The Military Committee has examined all the evidence taken before the court-martial and all the additional testimony which explains the case. They have gone through the matter carefully and made an elaborate report, reciting the facts and stating as a part of their conclusion that the evidence shows that this man at the time he was charged with desertion was absent on account of sickness and unable to return; that he did return as promptly as he could, and was then honorably discharged and mustered out. But this charge which was made against him has never been erased from his record, and could not be except by act of Congress.

Mr. STALLINGS. I just wanted to know the facts.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] will pardon me for making this suggestion, as I understand there were no so-called "honorable" discharges granted from the late war. The word "honorable" which used to be in every discharge granted to a soldier is left out, as I understand it, from every discharge, so that while the soldier was discharged from the service, the word "honorable" was left out and each man is left to his record as it stands in the Adjutant-General's Office.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. He does not get any discharge at all!

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. He is discharged from the service, but the word "honorable," which used to be in the certificate of discharge, is omitted.

Mr. LACEY. The report says he was honorably mustered out with his company.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But it does not say he was honorably discharged.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Suppose he had a discharge, would that record of his having been court-martialed as a deserter stand in the way of his getting another copy of his discharge, if he lost it?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. This is more a sentimental bill than anything else.

Mr. KYLE. Is there anything now to prevent this man from drawing a pension?

Mr. LACEY. Not on the face of the report.

Mr. KYLE. Is there, as a matter of fact.

Mr. LACEY. I do not know.

Mr. KYLE. The point I want to get at is whether this proposition is simply to relieve this man from this charge of desertion without putting him on the pension roll?

Mr. HUDSON. That is all there is in the bill.

Mr. KYLE. I understood that this was simply a direction that the charge of desertion be stricken from the roll, and that his record be corrected in that respect.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I should like to say to the gentleman that if he could draw a pension now he could not draw it after this bill is passed, as the bill now stands.

Mr. HUDSON. As I understand, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. KYLE] wishes to know whether this is a bill to pension him now or simply to clear up his military record?

Mr. KYLE. No, that is not it. I understand the statement is that there is nothing in the way of this man drawing a pension; in other words, that if he could draw a pension after the passage of the bill, he could draw it now just as well. In other words, that this bill does not aid him toward getting a pension.

Mr. CUMMINGS. As I understand, this bill stops him from getting a pension.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No, it does not.

Mr. WANGER. As I understand the report of the committee, it shows that this man was not in fact a deserter, and that the record of desertion against him is an unjust and erroneous one.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is the fact.

Mr. WANGER. Now, why should we say anything about a pension in discussing this bill?

Mr. NORTHWAY. He ought to have his record corrected.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is all.

Mr. WANGER. It seems to me that if he does not deserve to have this stigma attached to his name, that it ought not to be attached.

Mr. COX. As I understand, this man was marked on the roll as a deserter, and was then tried by a court-martial?

Mr. WANGER. Yes.

Mr. COX. And he was found by the court-martial to be a deserter?

Mr. WANGER. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to make a correction as to that. The gentleman is misinformed.

Mr. COX. I want to get at the fact as to how that is.

Mr. LACEY. In a hasty examination of this report I find that there was no trial upon the charge of desertion. Charges were preferred, but no trial was had upon the charges; but the charges still remain there, undisposed of.

Mr. COX. You are satisfied that there was no trial?

Mr. BOWERS of California. There was no trial at all. The man was sick, and the evidence presented to the committee shows conclusively that he was not a deserter.

Mr. COX. This bill is simply to wipe out these charges that remain there undisposed of.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Yes. We have the evidence of three physicians who attended him for two years, and the evidence shows that before he was able he returned voluntarily to the regiment, and that he was in no sense a deserter.

Mr. COX. If I understand the bill, it is simply to provide that these charges be wiped out?

Mr. BOWERS of California. It is simply to correct a false record.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I thank the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] for the explanation which he has made, and it would have been in very much better grace for the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MCKEIGHAN] while he was hurling all that abuse at me to have made that simple explanation instead. It would have satisfied me, and if the fact is as stated by the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] I have no further opposition.

Mr. BOWERS of California. We gave the question a very thorough examination, and I state to the gentleman that that is the fact.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. If that is the case, I am glad the gentleman has made the explanation.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is the real fact.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. If the man is not a real deserter, I have nothing against him; but I still do claim that I do not love deserters.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, the question was asked of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions whether or not this applicant could, with the charge of desertion remaining against him, obtain a pension. I have not heard the chairman of the committee give any answer to that question.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to say right here that this is a bill which does not come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. It comes from the Military Committee, of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] is chairman.

The reason that I speak at all upon this matter is because the question of a pension came up. It seems to me that the passage of this bill or the failure to pass it has no bearing whatever on the question of the right of the man to a pension.

Mr. ROBBINS. I understand that; but there has been a plain question asked, and I ask if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] is in charge of the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No, I am not in charge of this bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. You are advocating the bill, and the question has been asked whether or not this man can draw a pension with this charge of desertion remaining there against him, or if the object of this bill is to enable him to get on the pension roll.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I say to you frankly that I can not answer that question, except to say this: The amendment that is put onto this bill provides specifically that it shall give him no rights that he does not now possess.

Mr. ROBBINS. What is the object of this bill, then?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Just simply that these charges were preferred against him. There never was a trial, and still there is a charge standing against him on his military record, of which record he has a right to be proud, and he simply wants that to be cleared up by a special bill.

Mr. ROBBINS. As I understand the law there is a method of procedure by which he can go before the War Department and have this charge removed. That being so, what is the necessity of this special bill to relieve him from this charge?

Mr. BOWERS of California. No, he can not do that under the law.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman from California, who is a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BOWERS of California. This is one of the cases not provided by law; and the War Department can not relieve him from this charge under the law.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why?

Mr. BOWERS of California (continuing). And, therefore, following the action of the committee in other bills, we have reported this bill favorably.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why?

Mr. BOWERS of California. Because the War Department have only their own records to go on, and they are not allowed under the law to relieve a man from a charge of desertion under such circumstances as are presented in this case. They are confined to their rule.

Mr. LANE. What rule?

Mr. BOWERS of California. They can not go beyond it; and they never have gone beyond their rule.

Mr. ROBBINS. What rule excludes this man from getting the charge of desertion removed?

Mr. BOWERS of California. The rule is that the Department can not restore a man against their own records showing that he was a deserter. The law does not allow any Department to do that; and Congress must do it.

Mr. LANE. You are wrong about that.

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman does not seem to know the law.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Laws have been passed authorizing the War Department to remove the charge of desertion. It is probable this case does not come within the limitation.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why can not this man go to the War Department and have this charge of desertion removed?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am trying to tell you. These laws prescribe that he must not have been away from his command more than a certain period. In this case the absence may have exceeded the period, and I presume that is the difficulty in this case.

Mr. ROBBINS. You presume! You do not know that that is the case?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, I can ascertain by reading the report. I have sent for a copy.

Mr. ROBBINS. How many will it require to answer this simple question? I will yield to just as many as try to answer the question.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will answer you and say that general laws have been passed authorizing the War Department to remove charges of desertion within certain limitations, and this case does not come within those limitations.

Mr. ROBBINS. Why?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think in this case the man may have been absent longer than the period prescribed, or possibly some other reason——

Mr. ROBBINS. The gentleman says he thinks. Does he know the facts in connection with this case?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes. I see he was absent more than the time prescribed. That is sufficient; but I find there are other reasons.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to see so much captious objection to this case. It seems to me that it is not a question of whether a man will or will not get a pension. If the facts be true as reported by that committee, and if it be true that this was an honorable and gallant soldier, that he fought during the war, and he finds this charge was made against him, and this stigma was resting on his character, I do not think that the question as to whether he shall receive this paltry sum of pension should be raised. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to the passage of the bill. This man was an honest and gallant soldier who was honorably discharged. He fought like a man, and the question of whether he will or will not get a pension is no reason why this Congress should refuse to remove that stigma from his character. We have had a committee examine the case, and they have found the state of facts that he was a gallant, brave, honest soldier who fought through the war and that he is met with this charge of desertion.

I think it comes with poor grace from any man when a man has fought for his flag to say this man should not be allowed the right to draw a pension when they allow men who served ninety days to receive them. It is not a question of pension. I think that we should move cautiously when removing charges of desertion. I think when these charges of desertion are removed by Congress that it is a high honor for a man to have his character cleared up by Congress, and it should be done whether it carries with it the fact that he is to be paid $80 or $90 pension. If the testimony shows that this man was improperly treated, without any fault of his own, his character should be cleared, and I hope gentlemen will make no captious objections to this bill if the facts are true as stated. [Applause.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am now ready to answer the question of my colleague from Alabama, having examined the report. I find on page 3 of the report the reason is stated why the War Department can not remove the charge of desertion. The record does not show that he voluntarily returned to his command

Mr. STALLINGS. But does it not show that he returned to another command?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; I think not.

Mr. STALLINGS. It was so stated here.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The affidavits placed before the committee show that he did voluntarily return to his command, and their affidavits show that the record of the soldier should be corrected.

They show that he did not desert the service. They show that he did not leave his command with the intention of not returning to duty.

The soldier himself testifies—that he was furloughed October, 1862, on account of sickness, being unfit for duty; that he reported to his command in March, 1864, at Nashville, Tenn., and upon examination, being still found unfit for duty, was returned to the hospital at Chattanooga. He further stated that the furlough granted him was issued by Capt. Littlejohn and was without limit, and that upon his return to his command Capt. Littlejohn had resigned and been succeeded by Capt. John Postin; and he declared that he returned to his command voluntarily and without orders or arrest.

If that is true he was not a deserter.

He is sustained by his physician. This gentleman testifies as I will read:

Dr. William Pryor, in an affidavit executed March 24, 1886, stated that in 1862 he treated the claimant as a furloughed soldier of Company I, Eighteenth Kentucky Infantry, and continued to treat him from October, 1862, to March, 1864, when he returned to his command, taking with him a statement he was not able for duty. He added that the soldier's furlough was signed by Capt. William Littlejohn, Paris, Ky., and that his return to his command was voluntary.

Now we come to the testimony of his comrades. They testify as follows:

David Trout, a former affiant, in an affidavit dated March 24, 1886, stated that Cohorn was not arrested as a deserter, but returned to his command of his own free will, and that he appeared anxious to go, saying he wanted to fight for his country.

Wendle Trout, a former affiant, in an affidavit made April 2, 1886, gave testimony identical with that of David Trout, last preceding.

Henry J. Newton, a former affiant, in an affidavit made March 25, 1886, declared that the claimant was furloughed by Capt. William Littlejohn, at Paris, in October, 1862, and that he voluntarily returned to his command at Nashville, in March, 1864.

William B. Newton, in an affidavit dated March 24, 1886, stated that claimant returned to his command voluntarily.

There is much more testimony of the same tenor, all of which the committee regarded as conclusive, and the committee felt that justice demanded that he should be relieved of the charge of desertion; because the proof before that committee shows that he came within the limitations of the law. It certainly established that he returned voluntarily to duty within the proper time. I think that in this case we ought to pass the bill. The Military Committee, of which I am a member, has examined these cases with great care. Not more than one-tenth of the bills brought before that committee for the removal of the charge of desertion have been reported favorably. Nine-tenths of them have been rejected. The committee has, with great care, examined every case; and we have never reported a case favorably unless the evidence before the committee showed that it was one that ought to be acted upon favorably by Congress. This soldier was absent sick, returned to his regiment, fought through the war, and was discharged with his comrades after the war was over.

I am in full sympathy with every effort which seeks to prevent the enactment of laws which grant pensions to improper or unworthy persons; but the gentlemen who oppose this bill should observe that it does not grant a pension.

It only provides for the removal of the charge of desertion, and the bill specifically stipulates that no pay, bounty, or emoluments of any kind shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this bill.

The language of the proviso of the bill as reported is:

Provided, That no pay, bounty, or emoluments of any kind shall become due or payable by reason of the passage of this bill.

I am confident there would not be any opposition to the bill if all the facts were understood.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Let it be remembered that this man was discharged with his regiment.

Mr. ROBBINS. I did not yield to the gentleman, and he did not address the Chair. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from the statute which I send to the desk as the law bearing on the case. Read the second section and note 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to remove the charge of desertion from the record of any regular or volunteer soldier in the late war upon proper application therefor, and satisfactory proof in the following cases:

First. That such soldier, after such charge of desertion was made, and within a reasonable time thereafter, voluntarily returned to his command and served faithfully to the end of his term of service, or until discharged.

Second. That such soldier absented himself from his command or from hospital while suffering from wounds, injuries, or disease, received or contracted in the line of duty, and upon recovery voluntarily returned to his command and served faithfully thereafter, or died from such wounds, injuries, or disease while so absent, and before the date of muster out of his command, or expiration of his term of service, or was prevented from so returning by reason of such wounds, injuries, or diseases before such muster out, or expiration of service.

Third. That such soldier was a minor, and was enlisted without the consent of his parent or guardian, and was released or discharged from such service by the order or decree of any court of competent jurisdiction on habeas corpus or other proper judicial proceedings; and in any such case no pay, allowance, bounty, or pension shall be allowed or granted.

Mr. ROBBINS. Now read the note.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fourth. (2) Where he left his command and afterwards voluntarily returned and received an honorable discharge.

But in the fourth section of this act it was provided that no soldier should receive its benefits "who intentionally deserted."

The offense of desertion is defined by military authorities as absence without leave, with the intention of not returning, and the intent not to return is considered the gist of the offense. The Secretary of War has always asserted and exercised the right, under his general powers as custodian of the rolls of the Army, wherever a charge of desertion was erroneously made, to remove the charge. Wherever it could be made to appear that the guilty intent was wanting, he thus had authority, without the act of August 7, 1882, to remove these charges. It was therefore held by the War Department that the act of 1882, August 7, chapter 422, did not enlarge the existing authority of the Secretary of War, and practically no action was taken under it.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is sufficient. Now, Mr. Chairman, my position is that here is a case which the law covers like a blanket. It is shown by the report itself and the reading of the law that the way is clear for this man to go before the War Department, and if the facts as stated are true he can get the charge of desertion removed. Now, here is the House of Representatives in session, spending its time on a dozen special bills for men, when there is a general law providing a remedy for those cases. This statute, and the second and third of the cases cited, and number one cover the case of this applicant exactly; and consequently I appeal to the reason of members, why is it that they will go on without investigating a case and without knowing the facts, and when the question is asked why this man does not proceed in the way that is provided by the law, a dozen or more gentlemen jump up and try to explain something about which they know nothing.

Mr. BLAIR. May I ask the gentleman a question for information, as he has examined this case and I have not? I do not understand, from what he has said, that there is actually any record of desertion against this man, but that, he having been absent, charges were preferred against him. Am I correct?

Mr. ROBBINS. If the gentlemen will investigate the case——

Mr. BLAIR. Well, I am asking the gentleman for information.

Mr. ROBBINS. The bill is to remove the charge of desertion now on record against this man in the War Department. If not, then the introducer of the bill and the committee reporting it are certainly placed in a very ridiculous attitude. Here we have a man asking to be relieved of a charge when there is no charge against him, and here we are sitting in Committee of the Whole and idling our time away in an attempt to help a man against whom there is no charge at all.

Mr. BLAIR. I quite agree with the gentleman, if there are no peculiar features in the case.

Mr. ROBBINS. Then why should you interrupt me in my remarks?

Mr. BLAIR. I wished to ask you a question.

Mr. ROBBINS. Well, the report of the bill answers your question.

Mr. BLAIR. I have not had an opportunity to examine the report.

Mr. ROBBINS. Well, sir; I do not desire to be interrupted in that kind of way, nor do I suppose the gentlemen around me desire to have their time taken up by interruptions by a gentleman who has not examined the report.

Mr. MOSES. I call the attention of the gentleman from Alabama to the fact that he is now doing the very thing that he complained of his colleague [Mr. WHEELER of Alabama] doing a while ago. He complained that his colleague would not answer his question, and now he himself declines to answer the question of the gentleman from New Hampshire.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I did answer the gentleman's question fully. I answer it now by saying that nine men, unimpeached, make affidavit that this man returned voluntarily to his command.

Mr. ROBBINS. Do you take the position here that the law which has been read from the Clerk's desk does not cover this case?

Mr. SWANSON. Will the gentleman from Alabama permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. ROBBINS. I have asked the gentleman [Mr. WHEELER of Alabama] a question, and I pause for an answer.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I will answer the question if you wish.

Mr. ROBBINS. I did not ask you the question.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The War Department has refused to remove this charge. In this report it is stated:

On the 9th of April, 1887, the adjutant-general of the State of Kentucky was informed with reference to this case, that the charge of desertion against Cohorn had not been removed and could not be removed from his record under then existing laws.

Therefore this bill was introduced, and the affidavits before the committee show that nine men, unimpeached, testify that this man was sick when he left his command in 1862, that he was sick all the time, and while still sick went forward to Chattanooga and did all he could to get back to his command, and that he finally returned voluntarily to his command, but the charge of desertion was then resting against him. Now, it occurs in thousands and possibly in a hundred thousand cases that the charge of desertion has been recorded against the soldier because he was absent from his command, and yet not from any fault of his.

Mr. COX. Not hundreds of thousands of cases. Would not that wipe out an ordinary army?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Well, I reaffirm that there are many cases, possibly a hundred thousand of such cases.

Possibly two or three hundred thousand cases occurred in the Federal army of men having charges of desertion against them which investigation showed ought to be removed because they had been made improperly. For instance, a man would leave his command on furlough, the command would move, and he would be absent after his furlough had expired, and the charge of desertion would be placed against him, and in many cases would be afterwards removed by the officers themselves; but in many cases the charges were not removed. Therefore, the Committee on Military Affairs during the last ten years have recommended and secured the passage of various general laws which cover most of these cases, yet there are many meritorious cases which they do not cover.

Mr. LACEY. Is it not the rule in the Committee on Military Affairs not to grant special relief in any case without application having been first made to the War Department?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly. We always require that.

Mr. LACEY. And does not this report show that in this particular instance the Department refused the application because of the failure to return voluntarily?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The report shows that—

Under date August 12, 1883, the soldier made application for removal of the charge of desertion under the provisions of the act of August 7, 1882, and on the 24th October following was called upon for a statement under oath giving the authority under which he left his command and his whereabouts during his absence.

On the 28th October, 1884, he submitted the following testimony:

In an affidavit bearing the above date, the soldier stated that in October, 1862, while in the service of the United States, he was taken sick and was sent home on sick furlough by Capt. Littlejohn, and that he remained at home sick until March, 1864, when he returned to his regiment, though still in bad health, and reported to Capt. Posten, who was then captain of his company; that he was thereupon sent to hospital and remained there about two months and was then sent to the convalescent camp, where he remained three or four months, and was then sent back to his regiment and returned to duty, remaining with his command until he was discharged. He further stated that he was furloughed "until fit for duty," but returned to his regiment before he was fit for duty, and declares that during his absence from his command he was at home sick and confined to his bed "nearly all the time."

And he furnished much additional testimony, but—

Under date September 28, 1885, the applicant was informed that the provisions of the act of Congress of July 5, 1884, did not cover his case, inasmuch as he did not voluntarily return to his command.

Now, my friend from California [Mr. BOWERS] will recollect that two years ago, when our committee first took up the question of desertions, we had some dozen reports recommending the removal of charges of desertion, but on investigation the committee reported adversely on them all; and from that time to this the committee has examined these cases with great care, and has refused to report them favorably unless the circumstances were such as to show that the beneficiary of the bill was entitled to have the charge removed because he had not deserted his command.

Mr. ROBBINS. Now, will the gentleman inform us of the date of the decision of the Department?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. One was in 1887.

Mr. ROBBINS. Is not the gentleman aware that the law which is applicable to these cases has been passed since that time?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; but it does not cover this case.

Mr. ROBBINS. But the question is, why does it not cover this case? The law of March, 1889, will cover this case. It has been read here and its language shows that it is applicable to this case. Now, I will ask the gentleman when the affidavit was filed?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. These affidavits were filed at various times, in 1885, 1886, and 1887.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I want to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ROBBINS], that I consider this House of Representatives and the Congress of the United States superior in power to the War Department, and when the War Department refuses to act in a certain case this House may review that case, may act for itself and direct its subordinate department to do right; and that is the case here.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Let me correct myself at this point. I find from reading the report that the date of the last report from the War Department is much later. It is February 8, 1892. The report says:

In a communication to Hon. Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, dated February 4, 1892, referred to this Department by him, the applicant stated that he was enrolled and mustered into service July 7, 1862, as a private in Company F, Eighteenth Kentucky Volunteers, to serve three years, and was mustered out of service at Louisville, Ky., July 18, 1865.

Mr. ROBBINS. Now, the gentleman says there was no new testimony after the passage of the law to which I have referred. Mr. Chairman, the point that I was making is, give these gentlemen who advocate this bill an opportunity to explain the peculiar merits of this case, and to show why special legislation should be enacted with reference to it when a general law is on the statute books giving this man a right to apply to the War Department and obtain relief. The gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] says that Congress has more power than the War Department, and that when the Department fails to relieve a man of the charge of desertion, Congress can come in and relieve him of that charge.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Yes, as a court of appeal.

Mr. ROBBINS. That is true. Congress has the power, but I hope it also has the justice not to overrule the decision of the War Department unless a case of merit is made out and unless good reasons are given which will satisfy legislators who desire to do right and legislate wisely that they ought to overrule the court established by the general law in order that alleged soldiers in the position of this applicant may have an opportunity to go there, present their evidence, and have their cases tried.

Mr. Chairman, I am surprised. I am not a warrior. I was not old enough to take part in that heroic contest between the States, but I must say that I have in my mind a fixed opinion about desertion and deserters, and that opinion is equally applicable to those who deserted from the one side or from the other.

It matters not whether he enlisted under the Southern cross or under the Stars and Stripes; to my mind the soldier who started out following either banner and deserted it is entitled to and ought justly to receive the contempt and scorn of all warriors and of all true citizens. This opinion formed by me is, I must confess, formed from reading of desertion, for I have had no experience, and, I hope, have had no association with deserters. But, sir, I claim that here is a law that is broad enough to cover every case where men have that charge unjustly resting against them. For that reason I appeal to the legislators present to make haste slowly in passing this kind of special legislation removing the charge of desertion, a charge which is so offensive to any true soldier.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it appears by some remarks which have been made here that there were many deserters. Why, sir, I scarcely ever heard of a deserter until the pension roll became such an important feature in this Government. At the War Department there are perhaps hundreds and thousands of cases where the records show the charge of desertion but which never would have been heard of had it not been for the pension laws on our statute books. But for the matter of pensions, these men would have preferred to allow those records to stay in the dust rather than to bring to light the dishonorable charges that are there against them.

But, sir, back of all such bills as this there is a motive; there is something that prompts men to go into the archives of that Department to bring out the charges there and put the country to the expense of spending hours, yes, days and weeks in removing charges of desertion. I object to hasty action in these cases, action taken without going over the evidence.

Look at this particular case. Men were here to-night in the act of voting upon it without having investigated it; they were about to vote blindly; but after a little colloquy as to the merits of the case, they rise and ask about the bill and the report and say that they really did not understand what was before the committee. That is the attitude in which gentlemen place themselves.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. ROBBINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. I hope my friend wants to be fair about this matter——

Mr. ROBBINS. Certainly I do.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. I am satisfied that no gentleman in this House wants to make objection to any bill granting individual relief, if the defeat of the measure would work injustice. Now, when fifteen honorable men serving on the Committee on Military Affairs have brought a bill before this House with a favorable recommendation, that ought to raise the presumption that the bill is a just one. To-day when we were considering a great bill carrying over $32,000,000——

Mr. ROBBINS. I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech or to go into an argument upon outside matters. Certainly the gentleman can make his speech in his own time. I say the fact which the gentleman states is an argument in favor of the position which I take. Here is a bill reported by a committee; and the Committee of the Whole is about to pass it, when it appears that there is a general law giving a man in cases of this kind a clear right to relief at the War Department; and when gentlemen having charge of the bill are asked why this man does not receive the relief he seeks under the general statute provided in such cases, no good reason is given.

Mr. SWANSON. I will give the gentleman a good reason. It is a mere technicality that prevents this man from having his record made clear at the Department.

Mr. LANE. You are mistaken; read the report.

Mr. SWANSON. As I understand, the law requires that when a soldier is absent he must return voluntarily, or he will be subject to the charge of desertion. This man was sick; and while he was absent on that account an officer was sent for him and arrested him, so that he returned under arrest. The affidavits of various witnesses show that the man was willing to return, and that after his return he served gallantly during the remainder of the war. But on account of that little technical requirement that the return of the soldier shall be voluntary, this man can not, at the War Department, have his record cleared, although he served gallantly and was honorably discharged. Here is Gen. WHEELER and his colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs—fifteen honorable men—who have reported to us the facts of this case with a recommendation that the bill be passed; and I am ready to accept such a recommendation.

Mr. ROBBINS. Has the gentleman examined the existing law as applicable to this case?

Mr. SWANSON. I have heard the law read, as stated in the report. The committee say that the technical difficulty at the Department arises from the fact that this man did not return voluntarily. A committee of fifteen honorable men have said that the man did not desert—that he was anxious to return. An act of Congress being necessary to clear his record under the peculiar circumstances, why should we refuse it?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] withdraw his motion to lay aside the bill with an unfavorable recommendation?

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. ROBBINS. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ROBBINS] that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was rejected.

The amendment reported by the committee was then agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

WARREN ALONZO ALDEN.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2108) to perfect the military record of Warren Alonzo Alden.

The bill was read.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I raise the point of order that this bill is not properly before the Committee of the Whole under the order for Friday night sessions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand the gentleman's point.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. These Friday night meetings, as I understand, are for the purpose of considering bills granting pensions and bills removing the charge of desertion. I have no objection to this bill, but I think we should devote these evening sessions to the business which properly comes before the committee. If there is any doubt about this matter I will ask that the order regulating the business of the evening be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TAYLOR] makes the point of order that the bill just read does not come within the special order for Friday night sessions.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARY MARTIN.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1219) granting a pension to Mary Martin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act of June 27, 1890, the name of Mary Martin, widow of William Martin, late of Company I, Fourth Regiment of Rhode Island Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MCETTRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 1219) granting a pension to Mary Martin, and submit the following report:

The petitioner was the wife, and is, as she believes, the widow of William Martin, who served in Company I, Fourth Rhode Island Volunteers, from September 21, 1861, until May 2, 1863, when he was discharged by reason of anterior curvature of the spine caused by injury in the battle of Antietam. It is also shown that he was wounded in the head while in service by a shell. This soldier applied for pension May 18, 1883, but has not been heard of by the Pension Bureau since that date.

The petitioner testifies that the soldier disappeared twenty-six years ago, has not been heard of since, and is believed by all his friends to be dead; that she is about 70 years of age; that she has not remarried, has no property except what is mortgaged to its full value, has no income and no means of support but her own exertion and assistance of friends.

Maria T. Martin, of Providence, R. I., testifies to the truth of the facts sworn to by the petitioner.

Hon. CHARLES H. PAGE, Member of Congress, states in writing that after the soldier returned from the service his mind was somewhat weakened; in a short time he left home, and his family were never able to learn his whereabouts; that his wife never heard from him since that time and has for many years regarded him as dead, but she has never remarried; also that when the soldier disappeared he left his wife with one little girl to support; she had a small real estate in Providence, R. I., which she desired to sell or mortgage, but under the law could not unless her husband joined in the deed. Her attorney, now Judge Carpenter of the United States district court for Rhode Island, advised her to secure a divorce, inasmuch as her husband had been absent a long time, and this she did for the sole purpose of conveying her property.

From the facts set forth your committee is of opinion that the soldier is unquestionably dead, and that he was most probably dead prior to the allowance of the divorce, which would, in that case be nugatory. While, of course it can not be presumed that the soldier's death, if he be dead, was a result of his military service, the petitioner would be entitled to pension under the act of June 27, 1890, if she were able to prove the fact of his death only, and your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, this bill is similar to one which has passed here to-night where the husband of the woman whom it was proposed to pension has been absent for a long time, and never heard from. That bill was amended by adding a proviso that if the husband should return the pension should cease. I move that this bill be amended in the same way.

Mr. MCETTRICK. There is no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection, the amendment suggested by the gentleman from South Carolina will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LUCY BROWN.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4720) to pension Lucy Brown, dependent foster mother.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lucy Brown, dependent foster mother of Aaron B. Divinny, late of Company B, Ninety-first Regiment Indiana Infantry, in the war of the rebellion.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4720) granting a pension to Lucy Brown, submit the following report:

The petitioner is the foster mother of Aaron B. Divinny, who enlisted September 22, 1862, in Company B, Ninety-first Indiana Infantry, and died from a gunshot wound, received in battle of Nashville, December 16, 1864, as shown by records of the War Department.

It is shown by evidence before the committee that this soldier's mother died in 1845, and his father in 1848, and immediately after, when the boy was 5 years of age, Josiah Brown took charge of him; the petitioner married said Josiah Brown February 1, 1849, and from that time cared for the soldier as a mother; she is now 68 years of age. It is also stated that the husband is 70 years of age, and unable by reason of age and kidney disease to perform manual labor and is without means of support.

Since the foregoing was written it has been established that the foster father, Josiah Brown, died February 1, 1894, leaving the beneficiary penniless, dependent, and feeble.

In accordance with the precedents of this committee and Congress the bill should be, and hereby is, favorably reported for passage.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

LUCINDA C. WHEELER.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1463) granting a pension to Mrs. Lucinda C. Wheeler, widow of John H. Wheeler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Lucinda C. Wheeler, widow of John H. Wheeler, late private in Company L, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, in the war of 1861, and grant her a pension at the rate of $12 per month, subject, however, to the limitations of the pension laws.

The report by Mr. MCDANNOLD was read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 1463) granting a pension to Mrs. Lucinda C. Wheeler, and submit the following report:

The petitioner is the widow of John H. Wheeler, to whom she was married December 9, 1854, as shown by transcript of public record of Obion County, Tenn. Her claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Bureau for the reason that the records of the War Department fail to show that her husband was in the United States service as a member of Company E or L, Seventh Tennessee Infantry, as alleged. The records of the War Department do not show the name of John Wheeler or J. Wheeler on any rolls of that regiment. The records of the Surgeon-General's office do, however, show that J. Wheeler, of Company E, Seventh Tennessee Cavalry, died September 16, 1864, at Andersonville, Ga., of scorbutus.

Numerous affidavits on file in the Pension Bureau show that John H. Wheeler was enrolled and sworn in by Capt. T. P. Gray for Company L, but that these men were all captured before the company was filled so as to be mustered in. This, together with the record of death at Andersonville, leave no doubt that the petitioner's husband met his death as claimed, and as a result of his connection with the military service of the United States. It is clear that the deceased was not a member of Company E, and it is reasonably clear that he enlisted for Company L, as stated in the bill.

Your committee therefore return the bill with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, this bill will be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. STALLINGS. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will make some explanation of it.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH], who introduced this bill, is not here, nor is the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCDANNOLD] who reported it. The question involved here is simply one of identity. The matter was established to the satisfaction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and a favorable report was made to the effect that this soldier did actually enlist; but before he and his comrades could be sworn in they were taken prisoners, and he died at Andersonville.

Mr. SWANSON. What is the difficulty about presenting this case with the proof to the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It has been rejected at the Pension Office.

Mr. SWANSON. On account of insufficient proof?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No, on account of the fact that the record does not show that the soldier was sworn in.

Mr. SWANSON. And that is requisite, before a pension can be obtained, that he must be sworn in under the law.

Mr. LANE. This is a mere technicality.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes, and while the affidavits in this case, of which there are a large number, show that he did enlist, yet before he was sworn in, so as to give him a status in the Pension Office, he and his comrades were captured, and he died in Andersonville.

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Chairman, the pension laws are broad enough, it seems to me, to cover every case where a man can possibly make it out by legal testimony. Now, here is a case where a man comes before the Pension Office, and fails to make out his case to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Pensions. Still he comes here to this House and asks us to grant him a pension, on evidence that the Commissioner of Pensions has refused to grant a pension upon.

I know it has been said to-night by gentlemen on the other side that there are some of us here who object to these pensions, and they say that the men from the South are the ones who object to them. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that the men from the South voted for a pension bill within the last ten days that carries with it more than $150,000,000. That is not all. They voted also to keep up the soldiers' homes, without a single quibble, and that provision carries with it more than $3,000,000.

If you will go down here on any day when pension payments are being made at the office on Fourth street, between G and H, you will see men and women coming up there in liveried carriages, with footmen, to draw their pensions.

Now, when it comes to the honest soldier, who shouldered his musket and fought in the war, I do not object to his getting a pension, and he ought to have as much as the man who comes in a liveried carriage; but let him prove first that he fought in the Army and was a true soldier. If he will do that, I will make no objection; but in this kind of a case it matters not where I come from, or what section of the country I come from, I will always object to just such claims.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman from Alabama means to do just what he thinks is right.

Mr. STALLINGS. Yes, that is what I want to do, and what I am going to do.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I have no aspersions to cast on the motives of any man, but here is a matter that has come before the committee, and been carefully considered, and I think I am justified in saying that we do not consider anything hastily. We are very conservative in these matters. There are fifteen of us when we are all there. We always have a quorum. We never consider business without a quorum.

Now, what is this case? It is simply this: Here is a man who, in point of fact, did actually give up his life for his country, in the enemy's prison.

What is the trouble? A pension is applied for, and simply because the rolls of the War Department do not show that he was mustered into the service, on that ground the Department is bound to reject the claim for a pension, and did reject it.

This is a case of the very kind that our committee is expected to consider. Here is the proof that shows that this man did enlist; that before he was mustered in he was taken prisoner, and that he died in a Southern prison.

If you can make out a better case than that—I do not care how often a man may be mustered in—I should like to have you tell me what the case is. He gave his life voluntarily for our country, for our flag.

And shall it be said that because the Pension Bureau is without jurisdiction to allow a pension, simply because of the fact that he was captured before he was mustered in; shall it be said that the American Congress, sitting here with the flag before us, will now decide that although that Bureau rejected this claim on a technical ground that they were obliged to follow, that we, the House of Representatives, shall deny this pension, although the man gave his life for his country?

Mr. SWANSON. We have pretty strong proof that he was a soldier from the fact that he was captured and that he lost his life in Andersonville.

Mr. STALLINGS. There is something else in this record outside of what the gentleman on the committee has stated. According to the statement in the report made by this committee there is no proof that this man died at Andersonville, or that he ever was in the Army.

It shows that one man by the name of "J. Wheeler" joined one company of this regiment, but it shows that that was not the name of this man to whom we are trying to give a pension here to-night. Now, I would like to read this record again.

The petitioner is the widow of John H. Wheeler, to whom she was married December 9, 1854, as shown by transcript of public record of Obion County, Tenn. Her claim for pension was rejected by the Pension Bureau for the reason that the records of the War Department failed to show that her husband was in the United States service as a member of Company E or L of Seventh Tennessee Infantry, as alleged.

Now, she alleges that her husband, by a certain name, was either in Company E or Company L. The records of the War Department do not show that any such man ever served in the Federal Army; and yet we are asked here to-night to vote a pension in a case of that kind, when the record shows he never served an hour or a day. No, sir; I will never vote to grant any such pension. You may bring in the case of an honest soldier, a man who shouldered his musket and went to the front and fought for yonder flag, and I will vote for it every time; but when you ask me to grant a pension to a woman who tries to prove that her husband was in Company E or Company L, and the records of the War Department show that he was not in either one of those companies, why then I will not vote for it. The records of the Surgeon-General's office do, however, show that J. Wheeler, of Company E, Seventh Tennessee Cavalry, died September 16, 1864, at Andersonville, Ga., of scorbutus.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That was J. Wheeler, and in this case it is J. H.

Mr. STALLINGS. Now, then, can it be possible that we have come here to-night to grant a pension when the evidence shows that the Department is not justified in granting her a pension? If she could prove that she is the widow of this soldier who died at Andersonville, and prove it by competent testimony, I do not believe there is a man upon the floor of this House who would oppose it for a moment, or that the Pension Bureau would refuse or fail to grant her a pension when she could make such proof. But shall she be allowed to have a special act by Congress under such circumstances? No, sir; you will have to get a quorum, gentlemen, to pass a bill like that. I give you notice now that it will be necessary to have a quorum every Friday night to pass bills of this kind.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. STALLINGS. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Now, there are instances where men who have served in the Federal Army whose names have failed to be placed on the records. I have introduced a bill in which a man supported his case by numerous affidavits, who states that he served in the Federal service. Now, would you refuse a pension in such a case as that where he proved his service?

Mr. STALLINGS. Now, let me answer your question in the Yankee fashion, by asking another. Had he not a name?

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STALLINGS. Well, was it not shown on the records of the regiment?

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. No. The records never showed that he was mustered, I believe.

Mr. STALLINGS. Then how do you know that he was in the Army?

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Because he introduced witnesses to prove that he was in the Army.

Mr. STALLINGS. Do you not know that it is utterly impossible for a man to serve in the Army for any length of time without his name appearing on the company or muster roll?

Mr. WANGER. It is not impossible. I happen to have knowledge of the fact that in a three months' regiment, the Fourth Pennsylvania Volunteers, there were several men who served the full term, a couple of whom were paid by one of the captains out of his own pocket, and the names of none of them appeared on the muster rolls of the company, although they performed duty all the time.

Mr. STALLINGS. How do you make out that they were not on the company or the muster roll?

Mr. WANGER. Their names did not appear upon the records of the company at all.

Mr. STALLINGS. How can you account for a thing of that kind?

Mr. WANGER. I think I can account for it in this way: I think they started from the seat of the State government, at the capital of Pennsylvania, and the company being full, they were not received. They were anxious to go, and were permitted by their officers to go along. Some of them served without pay, others, as I have stated, were paid by one of the captains.

Mr. STALLINGS. Then they were simply camp-followers?

Mr. WANGER. Not at all.

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not mean that in the vulgar sense, as we use that term. I mean it in this way: that they went with the Army, and they could quit and come back at any time without being subject to the charge of desertion.

Mr. WANGER. Certainly.

Mr. STALLINGS. These men were not soldiers.

Mr. WANGER. Only in the volunteer sense.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. I will state to the gentleman that I had a case to-day where a man served in the Ninth Kansas and his name does not appear on the records of the War Department, and yet he has an honorable discharge.

Mr. STALLINGS. Then I suppose it occurred just as my friend from Pennsylvania stated a moment ago—that he went along with the regiment.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. He served, and has his discharge; and yet the army records do not show it here in the War Department.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The gentleman has no such case here. You have a case where J. Wheeler did enlist in one of these companies, and the name of J. H. Wheeler is given here. That man is now dead, and the husband of this wife has never turned up. Now, as I presume you are a lawyer, and I am one, you know that under that character of proof you could hang a man if he was being tried for murder.

Mr. STALLINGS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have failed to hang men on a great deal stronger proof than that, and I have tried very hard, too. They fail to make out the identity of this man.

Mr. NORTHWAY. When the boys were rushing out, North or South, to enlist, they were not very particular about putting down their names, and as a name went down on the enlistment roll, so it stood on the muster roll. Now, I know a man whose name was "Hiram A.," but he signed himself "H." He was a man who was shot all to pieces in the Army. He afterwards became recorder of our county. But he had a good deal of difficulty to identify himself as "Hiram A.," simply because he had been in the habit of signing himself "H."

Mr. STALLINGS. Now, let me ask the gentleman a question. The men in the Pension Office who pass upon these claims are lawyers, are they not?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Not always; but there is a lawyer there.

Mr. STALLINGS. These papers were filed in the Pension Office, and it is clear from the report that they refused there to grant the application.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Let me suggest to the gentleman, for he seems to be fair, and I make no charge of partisanship and I hope I never shall——

Mr. STALLINGS. I have not got a particle of partisanship in me. I do not know what it is. I have come up since the war was over and I have no feeling upon that question.

Mr. NORTHWAY. In the Pension Office they can consider only the cases of men who were mustered into the service. They may have clear proof that the man enlisted and died, but if he was not mustered into the service they can not consider his case. There is the difficulty, and not in a failure to prove that the man died or that he was the husband of this woman. They might have clear proof of these facts, but yet if he failed to show that he was mustered in, there would be the technical difficulty.

Mr. STALLINGS. As the gentleman has alluded to my being a lawyer, I may say that I have had a good deal of experience in that kind of business, and I have never yet found a case where I could not prove the identity of a man in a court if it were possible to be proved. But here is a case where they have failed to prove the identity of this man to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. NORTHWAY. No; that is not it. The difficulty is that there is no proof that he was mustered into the service. They might have had proof of the identity of "J. H. Wheeler," the husband of this woman, but unless he could produce proof that he was mustered in, the Pension Office could not consider his case.

Mr. ROBBINS. But they have not any proof that he is "J. H. Wheeler" at all.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, I say if they had that proof, still they could not consider his case unless it was shown that he had been mustered in.

Mr. STALLINGS. That is not the reason given in the report.

Mr. NORTHWAY. That is precisely the reason, as I understand it.

The question being taken on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation, the Chairman announced the vote as—ayes 43, noes 2.

Mr. STALLINGS. No quorum, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move a call of the committee.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, pending that, I move that the committee rise.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. MOSES, there were—ayes 25, noes 21; and the chairman announced that the motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee, finding itself without a quorum, had determined to rise.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 17, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read, corrected, and approved.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. By yesterday's RECORD I observe that a concurrent resolution directing the institution of suits in the name and in behalf of the United States against the officers and directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company for the recovery of money and property of said company illegally and fraudulently diverted, was introduced by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether that resolution, under the rule, does not properly go to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads? If so, I ask to have the reference changed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. BOATNER: A concurrent resolution, directing the institution of suits in the name and in behalf of the United States against the officers and directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company for the recovery of money and property of said company illegally and fraudulently diverted.

The SPEAKER. This resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Chair thinks it ought to have gone to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads; but that is for the House now to determine.

Mr. REILLY. I move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], who introduced that resolution and at whose request it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, is absent, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. REILLY] withhold the matter until the return of the author of the resolution. I think it is perfectly clear, under the rule, that the resolution might properly be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I think it equally clear that it might have gone to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads, and I suggest to the gentleman that in the absence of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] the matter might simply be left in abeyance.

Mr. REILLY. I will say in reply, with the consent of the House, that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] is a member of the Judiciary Committee, and also a member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroads. The gentleman did not confer with myself or with any other member of the Committee on the Pacific Railroads in regard to this resolution; but as a matter of fact I understand that the resolution was not referred by the Speaker, but that the reference was made pro forma by the Speaker's clerk, as is the practice.

Mr. BAILEY. At the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER]?

Mr. REILLY. At the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], and I understand further that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] is absent for an indefinite period. It is not known how soon he will return, and I think it proper and right at this time, while the matter is fresh in the minds of the members in the House, to call it up and have it disposed of.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I believe the resolution has been referred to me as a subcommittee; and in view of this misunderstanding I will do nothing with it until the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER] returns. I am not in an attitude where I want to insist upon jurisdiction of the resolution; but at the same time I am not willing to see it taken from the committee which I know its author desires to consider it, and to be referred to another and different committee, in his absence. If he were here he could speak for himself, and I should have no part or parcel in the controversy.

Mr. REILLY. I will simply say this: Under the rule it is the duty of the Speaker to make these references. The Speaker has declared in the presence of the House that in his opinion this resolution ought to have gone to the Committee on the Pacific Railroads. Hence I do not believe there ought to be any question raised.

If there was any question about the matter it would be different, but the Speaker stated to the House a moment ago that unquestionably this resolution ought to go to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, and I insist upon my motion.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I want to suggest that the motion can only be made at the instance of the committee itself, and that an individual member of that committee claiming jurisdiction is not permitted to make the motion.

Mr. REILLY. I have conferred with my colleagues on the committee, and those with whom I have spoken have authorized me to take this action.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will cause the rule to be read, or read the rule:

Correction in case of error of reference may be made by the House, without debate, and in accordance with Rule XI, on any day immediately after the reading of the Journal, by unanimous consent, or on motion of a committee claiming jurisdiction, or on the report of the committee to which the bill has been erroneously referred.

And the correction, of course, under the rule, is not debatable. What was the point of order of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. BAILEY. I make the point of order that the motion to refer can only be made by the committee, and not by a member of the committee.

The SPEAKER. That seems to be the rule.

Mr. KYLE. I would like to say a word right along there. I would like to have something to say in this matter.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is not debatable on the question of reference.

Mr. KYLE. I just want to say that it strikes me that this bill ought to go to the Committee on Pacific Railroads, or all the bills should be taken away from that committee and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania make the motion by direction of the committee claiming jurisdiction?

Mr. REILLY. I must say there has been no formal action taken by that committee, or meeting for that purpose. I have spoken to individual members of the committee, who have authorized me to claim jurisdiction of this matter. Whether that will come within the rule or not I do not know.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, if the point is made, it ought to be at the request of the committee.

Mr. REILLY. Very well; I will withdraw the motion, and will have a meeting of the committee for that purpose.

PONTOON BRIDGE AT SIOUX CITY, IOWA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 5425) for a charter for the Iowa and Nebraska Pontoon Bridge Company, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HAINER of Nebraska, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

HIGH WAGON BRIDGE AT SIOUX CITY.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the title will be amended as recommended by the Senate.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

COL. JESSE H. STRICKLAND.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 838) for the relief of Col. Jesse H. Strickland, Eighth Tennessee Cavalry, United States Volunteers.

Mr. COOMBS. The House having reported a bill exactly similar, I ask that that bill be permitted to lie on the Speaker's table for the present.

There was no objection.

ACCOUNTS BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND THE STATE OF TENNESSEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the joint resolution (S. R. 61) providing for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee, and certain claims of the State of Tennessee against the United States.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask that that resolution be permitted to lie on the Speaker's desk without any action being taken at the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate bills; which were severally read and referred as follows:

The bill (S. 179) authorizing the restoration of the name of Thomas H. Carpenter, late captain Seventeenth United States Infantry, to the rolls of the Army, and providing that he be placed on the list of retired officers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The (bill S. 575) for the relief of Sarah K. McLean, widow of the late Lieut. Col. Nathaniel H. McLean—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (S. 260) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the most accessible point between the city of Kansas and the town of Sibley, in the county of Jackson and the State of Missouri," approved March 3, 1887—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The bill (S. 1759) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post-road"—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The bill (S. 176) granting the right of way to the Duluth and Manitoba Railroad Company across the Fort Pembina reservation in North Dakota—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 1458) granting to the Duluth and Winnipeg Railroad Company a right of way through the Chippewa and White Earth Indian Reservations in the State of Minnesota—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The bill (S. 1230) for the relief of Maria T. Karge—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill (S. 349) for the relief of Thomas Chambers—to the Committee on Claims.

CHINESE REGISTRATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, showing the necessity for an additional appropriation for Chinese registration under the joint resolution approved December 7, 1893; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DAVEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

Mr. SAYERS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

The committees were called, but no reports were presented.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], I ask unanimous consent that the special order for 2 o'clock to-day be postponed until half past 2.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. LESTER of Georgia in the chair.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON] has to leave the city to-morrow, and as he is desirous of offering some amendments to the appropriations contained in this bill for the United States courts, I ask unanimous consent that we pass over the paragraph which was under consideration last evening and also the two paragraphs in relation to the soldiers' homes, and proceed to consider the paragraphs containing appropriations for the United States courts, beginning on page 89 of the printed bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. How much general debate does my friend propose to allow?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not propose any limit.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There are several gentlemen on this side who desire to be heard on that subject, I believe.

Mr. SAYERS. Gentlemen who desire to discuss this portion of the bill will have full opportunity.

Mr. REED. Is it proposed that the matter which is pending in this bill shall go over until Monday?

Mr. SAYERS. Until Monday. We desire to consider now simply the paragraphs containing the appropriations for the United States courts.

Mr. MERCER. It is understood, then, that the provisions with reference to the Missouri River Commission will go over until Monday?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HERMANN. And also the matter relating to all the harbor works?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. COGSWELL. I understand, Mr. Speaker, that if the request for unanimous consent is granted the provisions of the bill in relation to the Missouri River Commission and also the two items in relation to the soldiers' homes will go over until Monday, and that this day, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is to be devoted to the consideration of what are known as the judicial amendments to the bill. If that is so, there is, I believe, no objection on this side of the House.

There being no objection, the request of Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the paragraphs, beginning on page 89, under the head "Judicial."

The Clerk read as follows:

JUDICIAL.

UNITED STATES COURTS.

Expenses of the United States courts: For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court; of the circuit and district courts of the United States; of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; of the district court of Alaska; of the court of the Indian Territory; of the circuit court of appeals; of the Court of Private Land Claims; of suits and preparations for or in defense of suits in which the United States is interested; of the prosecution of offenses committed against the United States, and in the enforcement of the laws of the United States; and of the enforcement of the provisions of Title XXVI of the Revised Statutes, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto; specifically the expenses stated under the following appropriations, namely:

For payment of the fees and expenses of the United States marshals and deputies, $675,000: Provided, That not exceeding $500,000 of this appropriation may be advanced to marshals, to be accounted for in the usual way, the residue to remain in the Treasury, to be used, if at all, only in the payment of the accounts of marshals in the manner provided in section 850, Revised Statutes: Provided further, That hereafter no marshal or deputy marshal be allowed more than one mileage for each mile actually and necessarily traveled, irrespective of the number of writs he may execute in making such travel; nor shall any marshal or deputy marshal be allowed any additional mileage incident to the execution or return of any writ of arrest, commitment, or removal other than the 10 cents a mile now allowed by law for each deputy, prisoner, and guard; and no mileage shall be allowed upon any writ not executed or when the travel was without cost to marshal or deputy.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendments which I send to the desk.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Line 3, page 91, after the word "deputy," insert the following:
"And actual traveling expenses paid for each."
And at the end of line 5, insert the following:
"And no fee shall be paid to any marshal for the execution of any warrant from a United States commissioner, unless the same shall have been executed within sixty days after the warrant was issued."

Mr. SAYERS. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. COGSWELL. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE] may have thirty minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to wait a little and he shall have his thirty minutes. I will procure him the time.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have offered and the other amendments which I intend to offer have been submitted to the Attorney-General and have his approval and the unanimous indorsement of the Judiciary Committee, at the instance of which committee I introduce them.

The amendments were adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of assistants to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney-General to aid district attorneys in special cases, $20,000.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Add to line 19, page 91, the following:
"And provided that $5,000 of said amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended, under the direction of the Attorney-General, for such special counsel as he may authorize and employ to appear for the United States and assist the United States district attorney for the district of Southern California in the cases now pending in the United States district court at Los Angeles, Cal., wherein the Southern Pacific Railroad Company seeks to set aside United States patents issued for certain public lands to settlers in Fresno, Tulare, and Kern Counties, of California.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, a bill in relation to this matter is now pending before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the gentleman from California to allow that amendment to be pending, and, as soon as we get through with the amendments coming from the Judiciary Committee we will return to it.

Mr. BOWERS of California. And the gentleman will give me time?

Mr. SAYERS. Of course.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Very well, let the amendment be considered as pending.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees of clerks, $175,000.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

No. 2.

On page 91, after the word "dollars," in line 21, insert:
Provided, That no person who holds an office or employment under the Government shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office or employment, nor shall such person hold more than one office of profit at the same time, except as expressly provided: And provided further, That no clerk of a district court or clerk of a circuit court shall be allowed by the Attorney-General, except as provided in section 842, to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office for his personal compensation, over and above his necessary office expenses, including necessary clerk hire, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department, a sum exceeding $3,500 a year for any such service as district clerk or circuit clerk, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year: And provided further, That one person may hold at the same time the positions of clerk to the circuit and district courts, but in case both clerkships are held at the same time by the same person, he shall not be allowed by the Attorney-General, except as provided in section 842, to retain of the fees and emoluments of both offices for his personal compensation over and above the expenses aforesaid, audited and allowed as aforesaid, a sum exceeding $4,500, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year: And provided further, That no commissioner of a circuit court shall be allowed to receive of the fees and emoluments of his office any greater sum than $2,500 a year for his compensation, to be audited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year, nor shall any commissioner be a clerk or a deputy clerk of a district or circuit court of the United States: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall apply to the clerks of the United States district or circuit courts for the southern district of New York nor to the clerk of the United States district court for the Indian Territory: And provided further, That no district attorney shall be allowed by the Attorney-General to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office for his personal compensation, over and above the necessary expenses of his office, including necessary clerk hire and kindred and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage, as now allowed by law, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, a sum exceeding $6,000 a year, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year; which compensation shall be in satisfaction of all services rendered by the district attorney during a year under the statute or under the direction of the Attorney-General, of any kind and character including services in the circuit courts of appeals, whether within or without his judicial district; and this limitation shall not extend to the district attorney for the southern district of New York, provided for in section 836 of the Revised Statutes; and that section 840 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided further, That the same person may hold the offices of clerk of the circuit and district courts of the United States and United States commissioner in cases where the total fees of all such offices shall not exceed $2,500 per year. And provided further, That section 833 of the Revised Statutes shall be construed to embrace all fees and emoluments received by the officers therein named of every name, kind, and character received by virtue of such office, whether specified in any fee bill or not, and the clerks of the circuit and district courts shall embrace in their respective emoluments returns therein required all naturalization fees which are hereby affixed, as follows:

For filing declaration of intention of an alien to become a citizen, $1; for final papers and all services connected therewith, $2.

Mr. REED. I presume, Mr. Chairman, this amendment has been read subject to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against it?

Mr. REED. I would like to reserve a point of order. My attention has been attracted to the last part of the amendment; and I would like to examine it. I will reserve the point of order. I will have no objection to an explanation by the gentleman who offers the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania why this amendment provides that—

Nothing herein contained shall apply to the clerks or deputy clerks of the United States district and circuit courts for the southern district of New York.

Why make such an exception?

Mr. WOLVERTON. That exception was made in the provision passed by this House as an amendment to the sundry civil bill of two years ago—a provision which was drawn at the instance of the then Attorney-General and approved by him. It was his opinion, as it is the opinion of the present Attorney-General, that owing to the amount of business transacted by the district attorney and the clerks of the courts in the city of New York the present provisions of law with reference to their compensation should be allowed to stand.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is the gentleman from Pennsylvania through with his statement?

Mr. WOLVERTON. I am through with my answer to the question of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. CULBERSON. I wish to state that in the Fifty-second Congress I endeavored to secure the adoption of an amendment of this kind without any exception. But in the debate which then took place, and in which the Representatives from the city of New York took part, it was represented that there was an absolute necessity to make an exception with reference to the court officers in that city in order to promote the public interests. Why it was necessary I never knew; but the House, by an overwhelming vote, voted me down and made the exception. The bill went to the Senate, and the Senate declined to accept the entire amendment; it was struck out as a part of the bill. The amendment which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has now offered simply conforms to what was the will of the House in the Fifty-second Congress in relation to the southern district of New York. It is understood that the business there is immense, and that for some purposes it is necessary to combine these offices, though I do not know for what reason. I think the exception is wrong in principle.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is it not merely a political necessity?

Mr. CULBERSON. Well, I do not know about that; I do not understand that it is. I do not believe that there ought to be an exception made in favor of any officer.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Nor do I. I think an exception of this kind is without justification; and unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania can show some better reason for it than now appears, the committee, I think, ought not to adopt this amendment with the exception in it. Partiality ought to be done within this House.

Mr. WOLVERTON. The advice we have received from the Comptroller's Office and the Department of Justice, whose officers ought to be familiar with the reasons operating in the case, is to the effect that this exception should be made; that there is absolute necessity there shall be no change made in the system now prevailing in the southern district of New York.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I can not hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee will come to order.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I stated that the Department of Justice and the Comptroller's office, in which these accounts are audited, and whose officers must be supposed to be familiar with the necessities of that district, unite in saying that the law now existing and applicable to that district ought not to be disturbed. The fees of the clerks and the salary of the district attorney are now regulated by a special act and have been for years; they are not regulated by the same general statute which governs the compensation of the clerks and district attorneys in other parts of the United States.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This does not look democratic to me.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, this amendment involves a great deal of legislation, the nature of which it is very difficult to comprehend when the proposition is thus presented on an appropriation bill and in a five-minute debate.

Mr. LOUD (to Mr. REED). Do you want more time?

Mr. REED. I want more time to consider the question—not more time to talk.

It is very evident, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment covers a great deal of ground; and certainly it can not be germane to the portion of the bill now pending. The point of order seems to me so apparent, that argument would only obscure it.

Mr. WOLVERTON. To which part of the amendment does the gentleman object as being out of order?

Mr. REED. I find, for instance, the provision that—

No commissioner of a circuit court shall be allowed to receive of the fees and emoluments of his office any greater sum, etc.

Now, there is nothing in the pending paragraph relating to commissioners of the circuit court; and certainly that provision cannot be germane; and if any portion of the amendment is not germane, the whole of it falls.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It provides that no commissioner shall be clerk or deputy clerk of a district or circuit court. Is that the portion on which the gentleman raises the point?

Mr. REED. If it provides also that no commissioner shall be clerk of a court, it is liable to still further objection on the score of not being germane.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he might reserve a portion of this amendment till we reach the next clause of the bill, to which it will be germane.

Mr. REED. Here is a further provision that—

No district attorney shall be allowed by the Attorney-General to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office, etc.

That certainly is not germane to an appropriation for the payment of fees of clerks. This amendment, as I understand, is to be inserted after the word "dollars," in line 21. We have passed by the proposition for the payment of fees of assistant district attorneys of the United States, and are now upon the proposition to pay the fees of clerks. Surely this amendment can not be germane to that provision.

Then here is a provision that—

For filing declaration of intention of an alien to become a citizen, $1; for final papers and all services connected therewith, $2.

Certainly that can not be germane to the bill.

Mr. WOLVERTON. That is germane.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman say that is germane to the proposition to pay the fees of clerks?

Mr. WOLVERTON. Yes, sir, for this reason: The law now fixes no fee for the naturalization of aliens in the United States circuit or district courts; and in one instance the clerk of a circuit court retained for the year 1884 over $30,000 of fees which he received in that way, and refused to include those fees in his emolument account. The law fixed his salary by law at $3,500, to be taken out of the fees received by him; but he put those fees in his pocket, refusing to account for them. We are endeavoring to bring about a reform of the law by which such things can not take place. I certainly think that provision of the amendment is germane to the clause making appropriation for the compensation of clerks.

Mr. REED. The point I desire to make is this: If the House should see fit to adopt, as a system of action, the modification of appropriation bills by the introduction of new legislation, there might be a good deal said in favor of it; but inasmuch as the House has adopted a rule which excludes all new legislation, except under certain special and peculiar circumstances, that is notice to the community at large that no such questions are to come up on appropriation bills.

The result is, that when such matters as this are presented, they are presented without notice, and there is no opportunity for the House to become informed as to the nature of the propositions. The parties in interest, for instance, are not in any way heard, which is not just to them. That, perhaps, is of small consequence, as they are few in number; but it is of importance to the House that it should so conduct its business that it may give itself proper means of information; and information on all these subjects always comes from interested parties. Now, the proposition which I make is that this is a proposal to add all this long amendment to the words:

For fees of clerks, $175,000.

That is all that it is to be attached to. Then the second proposition I make is, that if there is anything in the proposed amendment which is not germane, the whole amendment falls. What I pointed out as not being germane, is clearly not germane. It can not be germane to a proposition to change the fees of clerks, to legislate with regard to United States commissioners. That being the case, it seems to me that is the end of the matter.

I do not know whether this proposed legislation is wise and judicious or not. It seems to me that we make a mistake if we undertake to incorporate this system, unless the House chooses to make it general. I have no objection to legislation on appropriation bills, if the House only gives proper notice that it is going to do it.

Mr. WOLVERTON. The objection of the gentleman can be overcome by dividing this amendment, and if it is insisted upon, we can do that. As to whether this legislation is wise or not, I supposed the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] and every other member of the House had ascertained by this time that this legislation is wise. I do not think there is any greater disgrace to the administration of justice in this country than the manner in which this fee system is carried on, especially by the commissioners.

Mr. REED. I would suggest further to the gentleman that this whole amendment is obnoxious to the objection which I make:

Provided, That no person shall receive compensation for discharging the duties of any other office or employment; nor shall such person hold more than one office of profit at the same time.

How can that be germane to a proposition—

For fees of clerks, $175,000?

If it can, all you have got to do is just to mention the word "clerk," and then you can legislate about everybody. This is a provision that no person who holds office or employment under the Government—no one whatever, not merely clerks, for this has no relation to them especially—shall hold more than one office at the same time. That has no relation to fees, no relation to $175,000, no relation to this part of the bill or anything connected with it; and yet it starts out with a proposition that is absolutely untenable from the point of view of germaneness.

I think the Judiciary Committee will find no difficulty in getting time, under our system, which of course is intended for the expediting of the public business—I have no doubt they will be able to find time to bring this thing up in a regular way; but I really hope they will not cast such a reproach upon our system, by insisting upon pushing this in here where it certainly does not belong, when of course they can have abundant opportunities to present it in the regular way.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. SAYERS. If the gentleman from Maine will allow me to make a statement: The object of a considerable proportion of this amendment is to protect not only the Government, but the people, against the incurrence of large fees through oppressive and unnecessary arrests.

A few days ago I saw a report from a special examiner of the Department of Justice, who had been sent to examine the accounts of the court in the northern district of Alabama, and no man can read that report without coming to the conclusion that not only ought such legislation as is embraced in these amendments to be adopted, but speedily adopted.

Mr. REED. That is a question on the merits entirely.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I wish to speak very briefly upon the merits. People are arrested who do not know the difference between an internal revenue and a postage stamp. A commissioner may, without instructions from the district attorney, summon four witnesses in every case. The commissioners are entitled, I believe, to $5 a case. Through the issuance of subpœnas, through the swearing of witnesses, and the arrests of parties, commissioners who really ought not to make more than $500 a year are now realizing in some parts of the country from $5,000 to $10,000 per annum.

If the gentleman insists upon his objection, why not strike out the first four or five lines, which apply to officers in general, and then permit the amendment which apply to the officers of the court to be considered by the committee?

Mr. REED. Simply because I want it considered separately, because I have some observations to make on the merits. Now that the gentleman has stated the purpose of this, I will say that I had the honor once to argue that case to the House about half past 4 in the morning, and with the assistance of that late hour, succeeded in having my views carried out in the general pressure that existed at the close of the session. I am sorry to say it was not myself alone that did it.

Mr. SAYERS. I will say to the gentleman again that these amendments can be thoroughly discussed, and I believe it is of the greatest importance that they should be adopted.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, the Judiciary Committee can have time.

Mr. SAYERS. The Judiciary Committee reported these amendments.

Mr. REED. Let the Judiciary Committee present them as a bill, and let us discuss the matter, and then let the House determine what it will do.

Mr. CULBERSON. The trouble is we can not get any time to do it. The morning hour is always taken up.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is perhaps a little bit to blame for limiting the morning hour. He will recollect that in "the earlier and better days of the Republic" the morning hour was so arranged that any length of time could be obtained. [Laughter.]

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, and it worked very well.

Mr. REED. Thank you.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to state that I myself am not disposed ordinarily to favor this kind of legislation; but there seems to be a great pressure now to have this amendment adopted in order to correct what are very flagrant abuses in the directions indicated.

Mr. REED. Well, now, frankly, we are drifting into a discussion of the merits, I perceive.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well, I leave the Chair and the gentleman to settle the point of order, and after that, if I have opportunity, I will present my views.

Mr. REED. It is proper that I should say that the difficulty about this matter is that we are liable to go from whatever evils we now have to those which seem to me to be greater. You have attacked the customs receipts of the country by the substitution of ad valorem duties, and I am afraid you are going to reduce the internal-revenue receipts by allowing people a certain mildness of treatment which is going to result in no taxation from that source, and if the customs and internal revenue both go out I suppose there will be nothing left but the income tax.

Mr. LANE. And bonds.

Mr. REED. Well, we can issue bonds, of course. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, to be universally admitted that this amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman insists upon his point of order, the Chair will have to sustain it.

Mr. REED. I insist.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WOLVERTON] that he divide the amendment.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I will divide the amendment so as to submit only so much as applies to clerks' fees.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say that in making the ruling which he did, the Chair is governed by the fact that this paragraph which the committee is considering is an appropriation of a certain amount for clerks' fees. The amendment which has been considered refers to certain sections of the Revised Statutes, which it proposes to change. Therefore it proposes to change the existing law. The Chair does not hold, however, that a condition or limitation may not be put upon an amendment, provided it is simply a limitation or a condition.

Mr. REED. The difficulty in dealing with that would be that the gentleman has not the authority of the Judiciary Committee for anything except the amendment which he offers, and consequently it could not come in under that clause of the rule. I think it would be better for the gentleman to leave the whole matter for the consideration of the Judiciary Committee in a separate bill. I have no doubt that there can be plenty of time afforded, because the Committee on Rules will give time for anything that is necessary.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I will say to the gentleman from Maine that the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses passed amendments on the sundry civil bill, with limitations therein, very much like these. They were in substance the same, and I believe received the support of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. REED. That may be so. Now, for instance, I am somewhat familiar with the design of some of these amendments, I judge, from what has been let fall in the discussion; and yet I had not the slightest idea of their being presented. I have not thought of the subject for two or three years; and my object is more to have open, free, and well-considered legislation than anything else. If the Committee on the Judiciary will come in here with a bill, the House will have an opportunity to discuss it, and we shall be able to point out the consequences of its operations if it be proposed.

Mr. WOLVERTON. It has always been in order to put on bills appropriating money an amendment in the form of reducing the expenditures. That has always been germane, and unless some legislation is put upon this bill, if we are to be made to depend upon a general bill passed by the House and the Senate to correct this evil, the probability is that it will never be done.

Mr. REED. That is a good objection against the doctrine that no legislation shall be had on appropriation bills; but it is no more applicable to this case than to a great many others.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Two years ago, in the Fifty-second Congress, four bills were passed by this House for the purpose of correcting some of these abuses. They went to the Senate and there died, or were not acted upon. In this Congress four bills of a similar nature were consolidated into one bill and sent over to the Senate, and there for about two months it has slumbered in that body.

Mr. REED. Then the object of the gentleman is to coerce the Senate?

Mr. WOLVERTON. At the present I shall insist on the amendment which limits this expenditure of the sum of money.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman will present his amendment we will discuss it; but, of course, he must present the amendment.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I offer the following amendment, after the first proviso:

And provided further, That no clerk of a district court or clerk of a circuit court shall be allowed by the Attorney-General, except as provided in section 842, to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office for his personal compensation, over and above his necessary office expenses, including necessary clerk hire, to be approved and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, a sum not exceeding $3,000 a year for any such service as district clerk or circuit clerk or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year, or in case of both of said clerkships are held by the same person, of the fees and emoluments of both offices a sum exceeding $3,500, or exceeding that rate for any less time than a year: And provided further, That one person may hold at the same time the positions of clerk to the circuit and district courts, but in case both of said clerkships are held at the same time by the same person he shall not be allowed by the Attorney-General, except as provided in section 842, to retain the fees and emoluments of both offices for his personal compensation over and above the expenses aforesaid, and audited and allowed as aforesaid, a sum exceeding $4,500, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year.

Now, the next, on page 3——

Mr. REED. I ask that the gentleman shall reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. WOLVERTON (reading):

That nothing herein contained shall apply to the clerks or deputy clerks of the United States district or circuit courts of the district for the southern district of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair supposes the gentleman from Pennsylvania does this to show exactly where the amendment comes in.

Mr. REED. The gentleman must reduce his amendment to writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will strike out so much of that as he pleases, and send up his amendment to the desk to be read.

Mr. REED. He must send up his amendment in writing.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I have sent it up; and I am indicating that portion I want stricken out; and I will read that portion which I want adopted.

Mr. REED. That is not the way to prepare an amendment. It must be done in writing.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can take his time and send it up.

Mr. WOLVERTON. If you will give me time I will prepare it.

Mr. REED. The gentleman can have plenty of time to prepare his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment offered by striking out the following language: "And provided further"——

Mr. REED. That is to amend the amendment. That amendment is rejected. You can not amend an amendment that has been ruled out. What the gentleman has to offer is a statement in language of what he wants, stating it specifically in language.

The Clerk read as follows:

"And provided further, That no commissioner of a circuit court shall be allowed to receive of the fees and emoluments of his office any greater sum than $2,500 a year for his compensation, to be audited and allowed by the accounting officers of the Treasury, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year, nor shall any commissioner be a clerk or a deputy clerk of a district or circuit court of the United States: And provided further, That no district attorney shall be allowed by the Attorney-General to retain of the fees and emoluments of his office for his personal compensation, over and above the necessary expenses of his office, including necessary clerk hire and kindred and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage, as now allowed by law, to be audited and allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, a sum exceeding $6,000 a year, or exceeding that rate for any time less than a year; which compensation shall be in satisfaction of all services rendered by the district attorney during a year under the statute or under the direction of the Attorney-General, of any kind and character, including services in the circuit courts of appeals, whether within or without his judicial district; and this limitation shall not extend to the district attorney for the southern district of New York, provided for in section 536 of the Revised Statutes; and that section 840 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided further, That the same person may hold the offices of clerk of the circuit and district courts of the United States and United States commissioner in cases where the total fees of all such offices shall not exceed $2,500 per year.

"For filing declaration of intention of an alien to become a citizen, $1; for final papers and all services connected therewith, $2."

Mr. REED. That is clearly not in order. That simply is a removal of the objectional features. It is clearly out of order.

Mr. WOLVERTON. Then the gentleman differs in opinion with the Attorney-General and the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. REED. That may be unfortunate for me or for the Attorney-General.

Mr. WOLVERTON. And with the Attorney-General in charge of that Department a year ago.

Mr. REED. That may be unfortunate for him, or for me.

Mr. WOLVERTON. For three Administrations the Attorneys-General have been trying to secure amendments of this kind.

Mr. REED. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that the Attorney-General has passed upon the question whether this amendment is in order upon an appropriation bill?

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, no.

Mr. WOLVERTON. He approved of it.

Mr. REED. But the gentleman does not seem to get at the distinction. It is not a question of the merits. It is a question of whether it is in order under our rules; and I venture to differ with the Attorney-General if he took the gentleman's side of it.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I can not say that I had examined with him the rules of this House in reference to it.

Mr. REED. That is the point. It shows itself very clearly that it is not germane and not in order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I want to make this statement. These amendments were passed upon by the Committee on the Judiciary and reported to the Committee on Appropriations, in the hope that an opportunity might occur somewhere on this bill to have them adopted. We have passed heretofore, during this session of Congress, a measure involving most of these provisions, which now lies in the Senate. In the Fifty-second Congress we passed a bill here, and I think placed these amendments on the sundry civil bill in the last Congress, and without any objection from any quarter. The bill went over to the Senate, and the amendments were stricken out on the ground that the House of Representatives had no right to legislate upon an appropriation bill, notwithstanding their example. Now, since it seems that these propositions are not germane (I do not believe they are), and can not now be considered, I am perfectly willing, and I ask my colleague to withdraw them, and let us endeavor to enact them into a law in the proper way.

Mr. REED. I think that is wise.

Mr. WOLVERTON. I withdraw the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fees of United States commissioners and justices of the peace acting as United States commissioners, $100,000.

Mr. REED. I desire to make the point of order on all after the word "dollars," in line 24, page 91.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the language to which the point of order applies is only a repetition of what has heretofore been upon the sundry civil bill.

Mr. REED. That does not make it law.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of the gentleman?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I will call the attention of the gentleman to the act itself. It says:

And hereafter no part of any money appropriated to pay any fees to the United States commissioners, marshals, or clerks shall be used for any warrant issued or arrest made, or other fees in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, etc.

It was not simply confined to the appropriation carried in that particular act.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Was that the law of last year?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Will you read the law?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Then it is not necessary to repeat it.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And hereafter no part of any money appropriated to pay any fees to the United States commissioners, marshals, or clerks shall be used for any warrant issued or arrest made, or other fees in prosecutions under the internal-revenue laws, unless said fees have been taxed against and collected from the defendant, or unless the prosecution has been commenced upon a sworn complaint setting forth the facts constituting the offense and alleging them to be within the personal knowledge of the affiant, or upon a sworn complaint by a United States district attorney, collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, or revenue agent, setting forth the facts upon information and belief, and approved either before or after such arrest by a circuit or district judge or the attorney of the United States in the district where the offense is alleged to have been committed or the indictment is found: Provided, It shall be the duty of the marshal, his deputy, or other officer who may arrest a person charged with any crime or offense, to take the defendant before the commissioner or the nearest judicial officer having jurisdiction under existing laws for a hearing, commitment, or taking bail for trial, and the officer or magistrate issuing the warrant shall attach thereto a certified copy of the complaint; and upon the arrest of the accused, the return of the warrant, with a copy of the complaint attached, shall confer jurisdiction upon such officer as fully as if the complaint had originally been made before him, and no mileage shall be allowed any officer violating the provisions hereof.

Mr. REED. Will the Clerk read after the word "provided"?

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, It shall be the duty of the marshal, his deputy, or other officer who may arrest a person charged with any crime or offense to take the defendant before the commissioner or the nearest judicial officer having jurisdiction under existing laws, for a hearing and commitment.

Mr. REED. There is a change. The words are "nearest circuit court."

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman that that is the only change, and it is put in there for the purpose of preventing the marshal from taking a prisoner past one commissioner in order to try him before another commissioner for the purpose of getting mileage.

Mr. REED. I do not think this sort of thing ought to be in an appropriation bill.

Mr. SAYERS. This would not be in the bill if the Attorney-General had not specially asked that it should be inserted.

Mr. REED. Let me see the amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman will find on examination that the language is word for word as it stands in the statute, with that exception.

Mr. REED (after examining the matter). I do not know but what the change is an improvement and I do not know that it is; but I shall make no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we return for the purpose of considering the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The paragraph to which Mr. BOWERS' amendment was offered and the amendment were again read.

Mr. SAYERS. It is understood, Mr. Chairman, that the point of order is reserved on that amendment. Now, I ask the gentleman from California and the committee to agree that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE] be allowed to address the committee for thirty minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Clerk to turn to page 35, and read that portion of the bill beginning with line 6 down to and including line 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

Punishment for violations of internal-revenue laws: For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violations, $50,000; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make a detailed statement to Congress once in each year as to how he has expended this sum, and also a detailed statement of all miscellaneous expenditures in the Bureau of Internal Revenue for which appropriation is made in this act.

Mr. SETTLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 35, line 6, beginning with the word "punishment," strike out all down to and including the word "act" in line 15.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation which has been read by the Clerk is one of the very few appropriations recommended by the committee which is an increase over the amount heretofore appropriated for similar purposes. So far as I have read this bill and compared it with previous appropriation bills but very few increases have been made.

I desire to discuss the proposed appropriation, and give the reasons why it should not be made. Under no circumstances should it be increased. The appropriation last year was $25,000. It is now proposed to double that amount.

What is this appropriation for, gentlemen? For the detection and bringing to punishment persons charged with a violation of the internal-revenue laws. I am opposed to the appropriation primarily upon the ground that it is not necessary. Why is it not necessary that this appropriation should be made? The evidence heard by the Committee on Appropriations relates entirely to a condition of affairs alleged to exist in the State of North Carolina, and that is one reason why I desire to address this committee upon the subject.

We have in that State, according to official figures furnished me by the Treasury Department, 919 commissioned revenue officers. This does not include deputy marshals nor those persons in the internal-revenue service operating on what is known as "Form 10." Nine hundred and nineteen commissioned revenue officers are in the State of North Carolina to-day. Now, in addition to that official force, it is proposed to put at the disposal of the Internal Revenue Commissioner $50,000, to be used how?

Mr. MORSE. To collect the income tax.

Mr. SETTLE. It may be used partially for that purpose, but I know from my own observation in that State that this fund is used for the purpose of bribing individual citizens to report upon their neighbors and to pry into the business of other persons. It is known in the State as "the corruption fund." It is provided by existing law, and in this bill, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall furnish to Congress each year an itemized statement of how this money is expended, but an examination of his report shows that the only information Congress receives as to the expenditure of this fund is the simple statement that the Commissioner has given such and such amounts to various revenue agents and collectors of internal revenue. It is said that this amount is to be used for the purpose of detecting violations of the internal-revenue laws at regularly bonded and licensed distilleries.

Now, it is known to the members of this committee, and to every person familiar with the internal-revenue laws and their methods of enforcement, that every bonded distillery has in charge of it a Government officer commissioned and sworn to discharge his duties uprightly and conscientiously. What additional force do you need, gentlemen, to compel the operator of a distillery to conduct his business honestly, when you already have a Government officer in charge of that distillery sworn to perform his duty faithfully and honestly? And that you already have at every one of these distilleries. But it is said that these officials themselves are corrupt, and that numerous violations of law are detected where they are parties to those violations.

If that is true, when the fact is discovered your remedy is to discharge the incompetent or corrupt officer and put in his place one who will faithfully perform his duties. But, so far from doing that, the latest instance brought to my attention is one happening quite recently, where the storekeeper in charge of a distillery admitted to the revenue agent that he was a party to the violations of law at that distillery, and upon the agent's report to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue setting forth the facts, instead of that unfaithful officer being immediately discharged from the service, he was simply suspended from duty for thirty days. I maintain that this appropriation is not necessary, that its uses are improper, and that it is a source of great demoralization in the immediate communities where it is used.

I admit that if this appropriation is increased to $50,000 it will largely increase the number of officials in the revenue service in the State of North Carolina, and will provide places for some persons who would otherwise go unprovided for; but I insist that the service of the Government, the proper and just enforcement of the law, does not require the appropriation of one cent of money for the purposes provided herein, because the official force is amply able and sufficiently numerous to see that the laws are justly and properly enforced.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is asked for upon certain grounds. I have in my hand the testimony of Mr. W. W. Colquitt, the revenue agent at Greensboro, N. C., and Mr. T. H. Vandevoort, the deputy collector under him, which testimony was heard by the Committee on Appropriations on the question of recommending this appropriation. That is the only evidence that was adduced before the committee upon which the appropriation is recommended, and the testimony of these gentlemen is confined to the condition of affairs existing in the State of North Carolina. They allude to the revenue service and the manner of the enforcement of the internal-revenue laws in no other State save North Carolina and a small portion of Virginia, and they ask for this increased appropriation, not on the ground that the service can not be properly kept up without it, but they say in so many words that this appropriation is necessary because of the corruption of the officials in the service, the storekeepers and gaugers.

Now, I insist that if those men are not proper and trustworthy officials the proper remedy is in discharging them from the service and putting good and honest men in their places. Every statement that these two officers make before the committee is a statement which goes to show the existence of ingenious methods by which the laws may be evaded; but their testimony discloses no fact which would warrant or justify this increase of appropriation. I do sincerely hope, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman in charge of this bill will permit me to have a vote in Committee of the Whole upon my proposed amendment. If he denies me that, if he will not allow me to go back to this part of the bill, then I give notice that when this bill gets into the House I shall ask a separate vote upon this proposition unless the gentleman moves the previous question and cuts off my amendment in the House; because I desire an expression of opinion by this House upon this specific appropriation, and I call upon my Democratic friends on the other side of the Chamber to aid me in obtaining it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me ask my friend a question right there. As this paragraph has been passed in the consideration of the bill in Committee of the Whole, my friend, as I understand him, now gives notice that when this bill is reported back to the House he will offer an amendment in the House to strike out the $50,000 recommended to be appropriated for these detectives, and if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] in charge of the bill receives the amendment before the previous question is offered that will give the House an opportunity to vote upon the question.

Mr. SETTLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But I understand my friend to say that if the gentleman in charge of the bill refuses, before he moves the previous question, to allow it to operate on this amendment, then my friend from North Carolina will ask the House to vote down the motion for the previous question so that if that motion be voted down his amendment will be in order.

Mr. SETTLE. That is my proposition.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I merely wanted to know what course my friend was going to pursue. [Laughter.]

Mr. SETTLE. My purpose, Mr. Chairman, is to get a vote directly upon this proposed appropriation.

I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read an extract from the Democratic platform adopted in the State of North Carolina, bearing directly upon this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That we as heretofore favor, and will never cease to demand the unconditional abolition of the whole internal-revenue system, as a war tax, and not to be justified in times of peace, as a grievous burden to our people and a source of annoyance in its practical operations. We call the attention of the people of the State to the hypocritical pretensions of the Republican party, in their platforms, that they are in favor of the repeal of this onerous system of taxation, enacted by their party, while the Republicans in Congress are taxing their energies to obstruct all legislation inaugurated by the representatives of the Democratic party to relieve the people of all or a part of this odious system.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I would like to know what those 919 officers, whose number may be increased to 1,800 under this appropriation, are doing in North Carolina.

Mr. SETTLE. A great many of them are assigned to duty at various local distilleries. Their primary duty is to take charge of all licensed distilleries, of which I think there are about six hundred in the State. A large number of officers are always commissioned, many of whom are not constantly upon duty. These officers are much more numerous than I myself had supposed, but these are the figures furnished me by the Treasury Department. I also send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read a resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of North Carolina.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas many citizens of this State are sorely oppressed by the practical workings of the internal-revenue laws of the United States which enure to the benefit of certain manufacturers to the great injury of the producers of our country; and

Whereas numerous citizens are now being prosecuted in the Federal court for the most trifling offenses committed against said laws, from three to five years past, and are being thrust into prison and their property sacrificed to pay cost of said prosecutions; and

Whereas the enforcement of said laws is not only engendering strife and confusion among the people, but is emphatically implanting within their bosoms a spirit of hatred and disregard for the Government itself: Therefore

1. Be it resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be instructed to use their influence to have said revenue laws repealed, or so modified as to relieve the masses of the producers of the burdens which are herein specified.

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, the extract just read from the platform of the Democracy of the State of North Carolina shows how the Democratic party in that State views the internal-revenue tax laws and how they have criticised the methods of their enforcement. Inasmuch as the testimony taken before the Committee on Appropriations is confined exclusively to the State of North Carolina and the conditions existing there, I may be pardoned for treating this as a question applying primarily to my State. In this connection I wish to say that those of us who are familiar with the political conditions existing in that State during the past twenty years know the fact that there has never been a campaign fought in North Carolina in which the Democratic party did not fairly commit itself to the position of abolishing the internal-revenue laws, root and branch, as soon as that party should come into power nationally.

There is no question on which that party is so fairly committed in our State as to the abolition of the internal-revenue taxes. Yet to-day, when the Democratic is in power nationally, they not only do not make an effort to abolish these internal-revenue taxes, but they increase them in amount and in number of articles taxed. They go farther than that, and propose in this bill to increase the "corruption fund" to $50,000 instead of $25,000.

I wish to read an extract from a resolution adopted by the Legislature of North Carolina—a Legislature overwhelmingly Democratic. In discussing the question of reforming the tariff and the internal-revenue laws they say:

If Congress should deem it impracticable to modify the present tariff and at the same time abolish the internal-revenue taxes, as the less of the two evils we prefer the retention of the former and the abolition of the latter.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the declaration of the Legislature of our State in harmony with the platform utterances of the Democratic party. So that this party stands committed primarily to favor the abolition of the internal-revenue taxes rather than the reformation of the tariff. Yet, to-day it is seriously proposed here to levy internal-revenue taxes, only increasing them, and also to modify the tariff. The Republican party in their platform in our State favor the abolition of the internal-revenue laws, and are criticised by the Democratic party as being hypocritical in their pretensions and in reality not favoring the repeal of those taxes or a modification of the methods of their enforcement.

Mr. Chairman, I am as much opposed to the violation of internal-revenue laws as any one; I am as much in favor of the punishment of their violation as any one. But I do insist before this Committee of the Whole that the evidence upon which an increase of this appropriation has been recommended is misleading and unjust, and portrays a condition of affairs that does not exist in our State. This fund of $50,000 is the cause of more contention and strife, of more confusion and bitterness in our State than any other one feature connected with the internal-revenue laws or with their enforcement. These officers armed with this appropriation, to be expended by them as they see fit, without accountability to any one, go into a community and bribe persons in various localities to report all technical irregularities at licensed distilleries.

The use that is made of this fund is improper and unwarranted. These men, if they would properly discharge their duties, are thoroughly able to enforce the laws to the strict letter without the use of this money. And when it seems to be the policy of this committee to reduce expenditures, I respectfully submit that it is not right to thus appropriate $50,000 without reason and in the absence of any proper demand.

Mr. Chairman, having said what I have as to the necessity of this appropriation and the number of officers who are fully competent to enforce this law, I will not detain the committee further, except by asking unanimous consent to print in the RECORD as part of my remarks these resolutions and platforms showing the attitude of the Democratic party on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks consent to print certain documents as part of his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

EXTRACTS FROM THE LAWS OF NORTH CAROLINA IN RELATION TO INTERNAL REVENUE.

[Laws of North Carolina, 1874–'75, pages 364, 365.]

Resolution of instruction to our Senators and Representatives in Congress touching the internal-revenue laws of the United States.

Whereas many citizens of this State are sorely oppressed by the practical workings of the internal-revenue laws of the United States, which inure to the benefit of certain manufacturers to the great injury of the producers of our country; and

Whereas numerous citizens are now being prosecuted in the Federal courts for the most trifling offenses committed against said laws, from three to five years past, and are being thrust into prison and their property sacrificed to pay cost of said prosecutions; and

Whereas the enforcement of said laws is not only engendering strife and confusion among the people, but is emphatically implanting within their bosoms a spirit of hatred and disregard for the Government itself: Therefore,

1. Be it resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be instructed to use their influence to have said revenue laws repealed, or so modified as to relieve the masses of the producers of the burdens which are herein specified.

2. That the secretary of state be directed to furnish each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress with a copy of these resolutions as soon as practicable.

Ratified the 30th day of November, A. D. 1874.

[Laws of North Carolina, 1876–'77, page 571.]

Resolution of instruction to our Representatives in Congress.

SECTION 1. The General Assembly of North Carolina do resolve, That the Representatives from North Carolina in the Congress of the United States are hereby respectfully requested to use their influence, as soon as Congress assembles, to so alter the revenue laws on whisky, brandy, and tobacco as to make them less oppressive on the citizens, and if this can not be accomplished, to vote for the repeal of the same.

SEC. 2. Resolved further, That each one of our Senators and Representatives in Congress be furnished by the secretary of the State with a copy of these resolutions.

SEC. 3. This resolution shall take effect from and after its ratification.

Ratified the 8th day of December, A. D. 1876.

[Laws of North Carolina, session of 1883.]

Resolutions favoring the repeal of the internal-revenue laws and reforming the tariff.

Whereas the present tariff is unjust, unfair, and burdensome to the people of North Carolina, and has proven a heavy embargo laid upon Southern toil and checking the natural development of Southern industry; and

Whereas the present system of internal-revenue laws is oppressive and inquisitorial, centralizing in its tendencies, and inconsistent with the genius of a free people, legalizing unequal, expensive, and iniquitous taxation, and, as enforced in this State, is a fraud upon the sacred rights of our people and subversive of honest government, prostituted in many instances to a system of political patronage which is odious and outrageous, corrupting public virtue and jeopardizing public liberty, and sustained by intimidation and bribery on the part of the revenue officials to debauch the elective franchise:

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of North Carolina: 1. That the internal-revenue taxes of the United States ought to be repealed at once, with such provisions, by rebate of taxes or otherwise, as will be just to those who hold for sale articles on which taxes have been paid.

2. That the collection from imports, unaided by internal taxation, of the large revenue now necessary for the administration of the Federal Government would give incidental protection to home manufactures amply sufficient for their healthy development.

3. That though Congress has power to lay and collect duties, yet to lay duties higher than the per cent at which they would raise the greatest revenue is, as to the excess above that per cent, to lay duties so as to prevent their collection, and is therefore without warrant in the Constitution, and that it is unjust and oppressive.

4. That within that per cent Congress may, in its discretion, select and determine the articles on which duties are laid, and the rates of duty on them.

5. That this discretion ought to be exercised so as to raise a revenue not greater than is sufficient for the strictly economical administration of the Federal Government, and the gradual reduction of the Federal debt, and so as to distribute the burdens of the tariff and the incidental protection given by it, as justly and equally as possible to every part of the country and to all classes of people.

6. That these resolutions are not intended to interfere with the application of the principle that it is just and wise to tax articles that are intended to be consumed as luxuries higher than the necessaries of life, and the materials, implements, and machinery consumed or used in producing, manufacturing, or transportation.

7. That the tariff of the United States ought to be reformed so as to make it conform with the principles set forth in the foregoing resolutions.

8. If Congress should deem it impracticable to modify the present tariff and at the same time abolish the internal-revenue taxes, as the less of the two evils we prefer the retention of the former and the abolition of the latter.

9. That the secretary of state is instructed to transmit copies of these resolutions to the Senators in Congress from North Carolina as an expression of the voice of the State on the issues to which they relate, and to the Representatives in Congress from North Carolina for their respectful consideration.

Ratified this the 26th day of January, A. D. 1883.

[Laws of North Carolina, 1885, page 677.]

Resolution of instruction to our Senators and Members in Congress.

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring): 1. That our Senators and Members of Congress from the State of North Carolina are hereby requested to use their utmost efforts to secure the immediate repeal of the present internal-revenue system.

2. That copies of this resolution be sent to each Senator and Member aforementioned.

Ratified this the 17th day of January, A. D. 1885.

[Laws of North Carolina, 1889, pages 521 and 523.]

Joint resolution instructing our Senators in Congress and requesting our Representatives to use their best efforts to secure the immediate and total repeal of all internal-revenue taxes.

Whereas the present system of tariff is unjust, unfair, and burdensome to the people of North Carolina, and has proven a heavy embargo laid upon labor and industry; and

Whereas this system has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be robbery under the forms of law; and

Whereas it has been clearly demonstrated that the present tariff supports and fosters monopolies, trusts, and combines; and

Whereas the present system of internal-revenue laws is oppressive, inquisitorial, and contrary to the spirit and genius of our institutions: Therefore

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring): First. That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives be requested to secure such a sound, healthy, and substantial reduction of the tariff as will make the taxation upon articles that are intended to be consumed as luxuries higher than upon the necessaries of life and those materials, implements, and machinery which are consumed or used in agriculture or manufacturing.

Second. That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to secure an early repeal of the entire internal-revenue system and all taxation thereunder.

Third. That copies of these resolutions be sent to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Ratified the 23d day of January, A. D. 1889.

[Laws of North Carolina, 1889, pages 521 and 523, 524.]

Resolution of instruction to our Senators and Members of Congress.

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring): SECTION 1. That our Senators and Members of Congress from the State of North Carolina are hereby requested to use their utmost efforts to secure immediate repeal of the present internal-revenue system; or if impracticable at this session of Congress to secure its entire repeal, then at least so much thereof as relates to the internal tax on tobacco and brandy distilled from fruits.

SEC. 2. That copies of this resolution be sent to each Senator and Member aforementioned.

Ratified the 30th day of January, A. D. 1889.

[State Democratic convention, held July 6, 1892.]

PLATFORM.

We congratulate the people of North Carolina on the era of peace, prosperity, and good government which has been unbroken since the incoming of the Democratic State administration; upon the pure and impartial administration of justice and the honest enforcement of the laws; upon the efficiency of our common-school system and great advance made in education and the general improvement and enterprise manifested in every part of the State, and we pledge ourselves to exert all efforts to advance the material interests of all sections of the State in the future as we have done in the past. And we challenge a comparison between a Democratic administration of our State affairs and the crimes, outrages, and scandals that accompanied Republican misrule. Affirming our adherence to Democratic principles as defined in the platform adopted by the national Democratic convention held at Cincinnati in 1880:

Resolved, That we regard a free and fair expression of the public will at the ballot box as the only sure means of preserving our free American institutions, and we denounce the Republican party and the interference of its Federal officials for their gross frauds upon the elective franchise whereby whole districts, States, and the Union have been deprived of their just political rights; and we believe the corrupt and corrupting use of Federal patronage and of public money, drawn by taxation from the people, in influencing and controlling elections, to be dangerous to the liberties of the State and the Union.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the entire and immediate abolition of the internal-revenue system, with its attendant corruptions, and that we denounce the present tariff laws as grossly unequal, unjust, and vicious. We favor such revision of the tariff as will produce a revenue sufficient for the economical support of the Government, with such incidental protection as will give to domestic manufactures a fair competition with those of foreign production. That there should be an immediate repeal of all laws imposing a direct tax for the support of the Government of the United States, but if it should prove impracticable to abolish the internal-revenue system, with all its attending demoralization, fraud, and corruption, then we urge upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress the importance of so amending the law that the revenue officers, who now receive in salaries in North Carolina alone more than $500,000, shall be elected by the people of the localities to which they are assigned.

Resolved, That the course of the Democratic party since its accession to power in North Carolina in furtherance of popular education is a sufficient guaranty that we earnestly favor the education of all classes of our people and that we will advocate any legislation looking to an increase of the fund for that purpose that will not materially increase the present burdens of our people.

Resolved, That the question of prohibition is not now and never has been a party question in North Carolina and never been indorsed by the Democratic party, and the people of the State at the general election in the year 1881, having by an overwhelming majority voted against prohibition, and the supreme court having decided that the prohibition act is not and never has been a law we regard the matter as finally settled, and any attempt to renew the agitation is merely a weak effort of designing persons to divert the minds of the people from the dangerous principles and corrupt practices of the Republican party.

Resolved, That while we are not wedded to any particular form of county government we recognize the fact that a large part of the taxes of the State are paid for the common benefit of the white people in our eastern counties, and that we consider it the bounden duty of the white men of the State to protect these people from the oppressive domination of ignorant blacks, and pledge ourselves to such legislation as will secure this end.

And whereas it is seriously suggested that a vigorous effort will soon be made to compel the State by judicial proceedings to pay the fraudulent and unlawful special-tax bonds amounting to $2,000,000, issued under legislation passed by the Republican Legislature in 1867 and 1868,

Resolved further, That the Democratic party will resist such recovery and the payment of such bonds by every lawful means.

[Convention held June 26, 1894.]

PLATFORM.

We again congratulate the people of North Carolina on the career of peace, prosperity, and good government on which she entered after the inauguration of a Democratic State administration and which has been unbroken for so many years since; upon the just and impartial enforcement of the laws; upon the efficiency of our common-school system and the great progress made in popular education; and upon the general improvement and enterprise manifested in every part of the State. And we again challenge a comparison between this state of things and the crimes, outrages, and scandals which attended Republican ascendency in our borders; and we pledge ourselves to exert in the future as we have in the past our best efforts to promote the material interests of all sections of the State. Affirming our adherence to Democratic principles as heretofore annunciated in the platforms of the party, it is hereby—

Resolved, That we regard a free and fair expression of the public will at the ballot box as the only sure means of preserving our free American institutions and that the corrupt and corrupting use of Federal patronage in influencing and controlling elections is dangerous to the liberties of the State and the Union.

Resolved, That we are in favor of the unconditional and immediate abolition of the whole internal-revenue system as an intolerable burden, a standing menace to the freedom of elections, and a source of great annoyance and corruption in its practical operation.

Resolved, That no government has a right to burden its people with taxes beyond the amount required to pay its necessary expenses and gradually extinguish its public debt. And that whenever the revenues, however derived, exceed this amount they should be reduced so as to avoid a surplus in the Treasury. We therefore urge upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress to exert themselves in favor of such legislation as will secure this end.

Resolved, That with respect to the tariff we reaffirm the lifelong and fundamental principles of the party as declared in the national Democratic platforms, and that the details of the method by which the constitutional revenue tariff shall be gradually reached are subjects which the party's representatives at the Federal capital must be trusted to adjust; but in our opinion the duties on foreign importations should be levied for the production of public revenue and the discriminations in its adjustment should be such as would place the highest rates on luxuries and the lowest on the necessaries of life, distribute as equally as possible the burdens of taxation, and confer the greatest good on the greatest number of the American people.

Resolved, That the course of the Democratic party in furtherance of popular education, by efficient public schools in all sections, and the establishment of graded and normal schools in the larger towns and accessible centers, is a sufficient guaranty that we favor the education of all classes of our people and we will promote and improve the present educational advantages so far as it can be done without burdening the people by excessive taxation.

And whereas there is now more than a hundred millions of dollars in the Treasury of the United States, wrung from the pockets of the people by unjust taxation on the part of the Republican party: Therefore,

Resolved, That we will accept such distribution of said surplus revenues of the Government for educational purposes as may be made by the Congress of the United States: Provided always, That the same shall be disbursed by State agents and not accompanied by objectionable features and embarrassing conditions.

Resolved, That it is due to the white people of our eastern counties, who have so cheerfully borne their share of our common burdens, that the present, or some other equally efficient system of county government, shall be maintained.

Resolved, That in view of the existing and increasing harmony and kindly feeling between the two races in this State and a similar condition of things which we believe to exist generally in other Southern States, we deprecate the attempt of the Republican party in its recent platform at Chicago to force civil rights as a living issue, and we denounce it as a firebrand and a hypocritical expression of interest in the black race, a wanton insult to the whites of the South, and tending to stir up strife between the now friendly races.

The convention met at Raleigh, N. C., and was in session for two days, May 30 and 31, 1894. On the second day the convention adopted the following

PLATFORM

We again congratulate the people of North Carolina on the continued enjoyment of peace, good government, and general prosperity under Democratic administration of the affairs of the State which has now been unbroken for so many years; upon the just and impartial enforcement of the law; upon the increasing efficiency of our common school system and the progress made in popular education; and upon the improvement and enterprise manifested in all parts of the State. We again challenge a comparison between this state of things and the outrages, crimes, and scandals which attended Republican ascendency in our borders. We pledge ourselves to exert in the future as in the past our best efforts to promote the best interests of the people of all sections of the State. Affirming our allegiance to Democratic principles as heretofore enunciated in the platforms of the party, it is hereby

Resolved, That no government has a right to burden its people with taxes beyond the amount required to pay its necessary expenses and gradually extinguish its public debt; and that whenever the revenues, however derived, exceed this amount they should be reduced so as to avoid a surplus in the Treasury. That any system of taxation which necessitates the payment of a premium of $270 by the Government on each $1,000 of its bonds taken up with the millions that would otherwise lie idle in its vaults and pay to bondholders who purchased in many instances at less than par, is undemocratic, oppressive, and iniquitous and should be refunded. The course of our Democratic representatives in Congress in their effort to give relief to the people from burdensome internal-revenue and tariff taxation meets with the approval of the Democratic party of this State, and we respectfully recommend that if they find it impossible to give our people all the relief demanded, they support any just and practical measure presented in Congress that will afford a practical relief from such existing burden.

Resolved, That while the details of the methods by which the constitutional revenue tariff shall be gradually reached are subjects which the Representatives of our people at the national capital must be trusted to adjust, we think all customs duties should be levied for the production of public revenues, and the discriminations in their adjustment should be such as will place the highest rates on luxuries and the lowest on the necessaries of life, distribute as equally as possible the unavoidable burdens of taxation, and confer the greatest good upon the greatest number.

Resolved, That we, as heretofore, favor and will never cease to demand the unconditional abolition of the whole internal-revenue system as a war tax, and not to be justified in times of peace, as a grievous burden to our people and a source of annoyance in its practical operations. We call the attention of the people of the State to the hypocritical pretensions of the Republican party in their platforms that they are in favor of the repeal of this onerous system of taxation enacted by their party, while the Republicans in Congress are taxing their energies to obstruct all legislation inaugurated by the representatives of the Democratic party to relieve the people of all or a part of this odious system.

Resolved, That the course of the Democratic party in furtherance of public education is a sufficient guaranty that we favor the education of the people and we will promote and improve the present educational advantages so far as it can be done without burdening the people by excessive taxation.

Resolved, That to meet an existing evil we will accept for educational purposes from the Federal Government our pro rata share of the surplus in its Treasury: Provided, That it be disbursed through State agents and the bill for the distribution be free from objectionable features.

Resolved, That the United States being one Government, and ours a national party, we denounce the efforts of the Republicans to force sectional issues in Congress and elsewhere, and to promote dissensions and ill will between the people of the different sections of our common country.

Resolved, That it is due to the people of our Eastern counties who have so cheerfully borne their share of our common burdens that the present, or some equally effective, system of county government shall be maintained.

Resolved, That the Democratic party is opposed to any further extension of the "no-fence" law unless such extension shall have first been authorized by a majority of the qualified voters within the territory to be affected thereby.

Resolved, That the Democratic party has ever been the party of the workingman and has never fostered monopolies, nor have "trusts," or "combinations," or "pools" ever grown up under laws enacted by it. The contest in this country being between aggregated capital, seeking to crush out all competition, and the individual laborer, the Democratic party is, as it has ever been, against the monopolists and in favor of a just distribution of capital, and demand enactment of laws that will bear equally upon all.

Resolved, That as all taxation bears most heavily upon the laborer, it is the duty of the legislator, as a direct benefit to the workingman, to keep the expenses of our public institutions at the lowest limit consistent with wise and efficient management. The Democratic party opposes any competition between free and convict labor, but it insists that the convicts shall not remain idle at the expense of honest labor.

Resolved, That ours being an agricultural State, it is our duty as well as our pleasure to promote any and all legislation that is best calculated to advance the interests of agriculture; and that in so doing we will most effectually advance the interests of mechanics, manufacturers, and laborers.

Resolved, That the Democracy of North Carolina cordially approve the administration of Hon. Alfred M. Scales as honest, patriotic, and conservative.

Resolved, That the ability, wisdom, honesty, patriotism, independence, faithfulness to duty, and manly courage of President Cleveland have won the admiration of all good men; and the interests of the country demand his renomination and reëlection.

PLATFORM.

Resolved, That the Democracy of North Carolina reaffirm the platform and principles of the Democratic party, both State and national, and particularly favor the free coinage of silver, and an increase of the currency and the repeal of the internal-revenue system. And we denounce the McKinley bill as unjust to consumers of the country, and the formation of the trusts, combines, and monopolies which have oppressed the people; and especially do we denounce the unnecessary and burdensome increase in the tax on cotton ties and on tin, so largely used by the poorer portion of the people. We likewise denounce the iniquitous Lodge force bill, whose purpose is to establish a second period of reconstruction in the Southern States, to subvert the liberties of our people and inflame anew race antagonism and sectional animosities. And we denounce the tyrannical action of Speaker REED and his abettors, who have changed the Federal House of Representatives from a deliberative body into a machine to register the will of a few partisan leaders.

Resolved, That we demand financial reform, and the enactment of laws that will remove the burdens of the people, relieve the existing agricultural depression, and do full and ample justice to the farmers and laborers in our country.

Resolved, That the Democracy of North Carolina take a just pride in the able and patriotic course of their Senators and Representatives in Congress touching the great public questions that have been before them for action, and especially do we appreciate the great ability and zeal of Senator VANCE in the protracted contest on the tariff question, which reflect honor and credit alike on him and the State of North Carolina; and we cordially recommend his reëlection to the United States Senate by the next General Assembly of North Carolina; and we commend the wise and satisfactory administration of our State affairs.

Whereas the education of the people is essential not only to individual happiness and prosperity but also to the maintenance of civil and religious liberty:

Resolved, That the next General Assembly of North Carolina be requested to increase the fund for the maintenance of public schools.

Resolved further, That we demand the abolition of national-bank, and the substitution of legal-tender Treasury notes in lieu of national-bank notes, issued in sufficient volume to do the business of the country on a cash system of regulating the amount needed on a per capita basis as the business interests of the country expands, and that all money issued by the Government shall be legal tender in payment of all debts both public and private.

2. That we demand that Congress shall pass such laws as shall effectually prevent the dealing in futures of all agricultural and mechanical productions; preserving a stringent system of procedure in trials as shall secure the prompt conviction, and imposing such penalties as shall secure the most perfect compliance with the law.

3. That we demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

4. That we demand the passage of laws prohibiting the alien ownership of land, and that Congress take early steps to devise some plan to obtain all lands owned by aliens and foreign syndicates; and all lands now held by railroads and other corporations, in excess of such as is actually used and needed by them, be reclaimed by the Government and held for actual settlers only.

5. Believing in the doctrine of "equal rights to all and special privileges to none," we demand that taxation, national or State, shall not be used to build up one interest or class at the expense of another. We believe that the money of the country should be kept as much as possible in the hands of the people, and hence we demand that all revenue, national, State, or county shall be limited to the necessary expenses of the Government economically and honestly administered.

6. That Congress issue a sufficient amount of fractional currency to facilitate the exchange through the medium of the United States mail.

Resolved, That the General Assembly pass such laws as will make the public school system more effective, that the blessings of education may be extended to all the people of the State alike.

Resolved, That we favor a graduated tax on incomes.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask now that the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] be read.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Before the amendment is read let the Clerk read the pending paragraph.

The Clerk read the pending paragraph of the bill, as follows:

For payment of assistants to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney-General to aid district attorneys in special cases, $30,000.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BOWERS of California was read, as follows:

Add to the pending paragraph the following:

"Provided, That $5,000 of said amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General as compensation for such special counsel as he may authorize and employ to appear for the United States and assist the United States district attorney for the district of Southern California in the cases now pending in the United States district court at Los Angeles, Cal., wherein the Southern Pacific Railroad Company seeks to set aside United States patents issued for certain public lands to settlers in Fresno, Tulare, and Kern Counties, in California."

Mr. SAYERS. The Chair understands that a point of order is reserved upon this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I ask that I may be allowed to address the committee for thirty minutes. That was the understanding. I probably shall not need the whole of that time.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the committee would accept this amendment. If they had done so I should not have detained the House a moment; but as they do not, and as the point of order is reserved, I will address myself to the merits of the amendment. It will be noticed that the bill provides that $20,000 shall be appropriated for payment of attorneys employed by the Attorney-General, to aid district attorneys in special cases.

This is a lump sum for contingencies that may arise, wherein the Attorney-General will need special counsel, as he does more or less every year in special cases where the district attorneys through the amount of business can not attend to it all. No one can state just what it is. My amendment, you will notice, does not add a dollar to this appropriation bill. It is absolutely in line and in harmony with the section intended to be amended. It simply says that here is a contingency that has arisen, and the Attorney-General is authorized to expend a part of this money set aside for that special purpose in this case. Now, as a part of my remarks, I desire to have read by the Clerk a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Before it is read I desire to say to the committee that this letter and other letters that I shall offer here were procured by me personally from the Interior Department and the Land Department. I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., October 24, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt through reference by the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior on October 11, 1893, for report of a copy of House joint resolution authorizing and directing the Attorney-General to appear for the settlers in the United States courts in the cases of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against certain settlers on public lands in California, accompanied by a letter from Hon. CASE BRODERICK, asking about how much land there is in controversy and such suggestions as in your judgment will aid his committee, the Judiciary Committee of the House, in the performance of its duty in the matter.

Assuming that the decision by the judge of the United States district court at Los Angeles referred to was that made by Judge Ross, July 24, 1893, in the case of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against one Juana C. Araiza, I have to repeat that said decision held in effect that the indemnity withdrawal made under the grant of the Southern Pacific Company was still in force. The withdrawal generally of indemnity lands under railroad grants were revoked in 1887 by Secretary Lamar, with the approval of the President, and since that time such lands have been open to settlement and entry under the laws of the United States by the first legal applicant, excepting those covered by selection or application to select by land-grant companies.

In cases where selection or application to select were pending it was necessary to show that the company had no right of selection in the land before entry could be allowed, and that rule is still in force. The question, therefore, as to the effect of the order of indemnity revocation by withdrawal of the case of the Southern Pacific Company was not involved in the Araiza cases, as the company had applied to select the land in controversy in May, 1885, before the revocation, and its application was rejected by this office and the Department upon evidence that said land was covered by a settlers' claim at the time of withdrawal, and was not affected by it.

For more than six years this office has been disposing of these lands to settlers, and if the ruling announced by Judge Ross on the decision aforesaid is to hold, the hardships to these settlers which will result, as all grants to and in the construction of railroads will be affected and millions of acres of land will be involved, this office has no hesitation in saying that in its opinion it is the plain duty of the Government to defend these settlers, and at the same time its own rights against the claim of the railroad companies.

The President, through the Secretary of the Interior, had no power to revoke an executive withdrawal, as was the case of the indemnity withdrawal for the Southern Pacific Company. Authority for the revocation of legislative withdrawal of indemnity land will be found in the fourth section of the act of September 29, 1890, 26 Stats., 489 and 496.

The papers transmitted by the First Assistant Secretary are herewith returned.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX, Commissioner.

Hon. SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, I also hold in my hand a copy of a letter from the honorable Secretary of the Interior, which is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 14, 1893.

SIR: I am in receipt, through reference from your committee, for report, of House resolution "authorizing and directing the Attorney-General to appear for the settlers in United States courts in the case of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Certain Settlers on public lands in California."

It is presumed that this resolution is based on the judgment rendered in the district court at Los Angeles, Cal., on July 24 last, in the case of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Juanna C. Araiza, holding, in effect, that selection was not necessary to the attachment of rights under the grant claimed by said company to lands within the immediate limits.

In August, 1887, Mr. Secretary Lamar, with the approval of the President, revoked all previous existing orders withdrawing indemnity lands on account of the grant for this and other railroad companies, and all lands within such limits not covered by pending or approved selections were ordered restored to settlement and entry, after due notice by public advertisement. From this time it has been the uniform ruling of this Department that, as to the lands within the immediate limits, the question was one of diligence between the company and intending settlers, the land being held subject to settlement and entry, until duly selected in the manner prescribed by the regulations of this Department.

Under these rulings many thousand acres of land within the indemnity limits, embracing odd-numbered sections, have been disposed of under the settlement laws without regard to any claimed rights under the grant, no selection having been made of the same prior to the allowance of such entries. Should said decision of the court be sustained it would affect hundreds of thousands of acres of lands disposed of under the rulings of the Department before recited within the indemnity limits of this and other grants made to aid in construction of railroads.

The lands involved in the Araiza case had been selected by the Commissioner as early as May, 1885, before the revocation of indemnity withdrawals, but she was allowed to complete entry for the tract on the ground that it was shown that this land was excepted from the indemnity withdrawal, and that her settlement outdated the company's selection. These facts do not appear in the decision of the case, but the court by deciding the broad question as to the right of the company generally to lands within its indemnity limits has held, in effect, that no rights could be acquired by settlement made after said revocation of these withdrawals even though no selection had been made prior to the revocation.

I concur in the opinion of the General Land Office, as set forth in his report of October 24, 1893 (copy of which is herewith inclosed), that it is the plain duty of the United States to defend those settlers whose claims have been recognized by the United States to lands within the indemnity limits against the harassment of the railroad company. I might add, however, that any question as to the propriety of the proposed action in the matter of the intervention of the United States, in the defense of the existing suits, would seem to be a matter coming more properly within the province of the duties imposed upon the Department of Justice, to which Department the proposed resolution might with propriety be referred, this Department having no information as to the force or appropriation at the disposal of said Department or other objections that might arise in carrying out the proposed action.

Very respectfully,

HOKE SMITH, Secretary.

Hon. DAVID S. CULBERSON,
Chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives.

It will be observed that in this letter the Secretary of the Interior says:

I concur in the opinion of the General Land Office as set forth in his report of October 24—

That is, the letter from Commissioner Lamoreux which has just been read. The Secretary of the Interior says that he concurs in that opinion—a copy of which is herewith inclosed, that it is the plain duty of the United States to defend those settlers, whose claims have been recognized by the United States to lands within the indemnity limits, against the harassment of the railroad company.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the question is just this: There are from 1,200 to 1,500 settlers with families on public lands, or lands that were public lands in the State of California, who hold United States patents for those lands. The Interior Department has been disposing of these lands and issuing United States patents for them to settlers for the last six years. The Department is issuing patents for those lands to-day. The railroad company claims them, and has commenced suit to set aside those patents.

Those settlers went on to a desert, and they have made a garden of it. They now ask the United States district attorney to appear and defend the right of the United States to sell those lands and the continuance of their right to continue to sell those lands and patent them, as they are doing to-day.

It is known to many, of course, that I have pending in the Judiciary Committee a resolution directing the Attorney-General to appear in these cases. This amendment of mine does not in any manner interfere with that matter. It simply provides that if the Attorney-General thinks it necessary—the language of the amendment is "so much as may be necessary"—to employ special counsel in that case; there is an appropriation made, of which he may use a part for those very purposes. I am arguing this matter now on its merits, because no point of order can fairly lie against this amendment that I have offered, it being strictly in line with the paragraph.

During the Fifty-second Congress I endeavored repeatedly, in every way that I could possibly devise, to bring this matter before the House and get an opinion and expression upon it. It was impossible for me to do it. I was ruled out on points of order, and I could not get a vote in this House upon this question. I was told I must go to work in some other way and get it on some other bill, and the matter was defeated. I did not know how to get to work.

I say to the chairman of this committee and to the gentlemen here that I now have discovered a way in which I think will bring this matter before this House and will test the question whether 1,200 or 1,500 American citizens, settled on the public lands and holding patents for them granted by the United States, have any rights that this House will take cognizance of. That is the question that I want to bring before this House, and I only wish to get a fair expression on it as to the disposition and belief of this House. The letters of the Commissioner and the Secretary of the Interior show that not only these settlers but settlers in other States are in the same condition exactly.

Now, Mr. Chairman, on page 94 of this bill I find an appropriation of $170,000, a part of which is for furnishing and collecting evidence where the United States may be a party in interest. Well, is not the United States a party in interest in this case? The United States Government claims to own this land, and is to-day selling it, is granting patents for it. Is not the United States a party in interest? And if the United States Attorney-General can, in various other cases, employ assistant attorneys to aid the district attorneys, can he not in this instance?

I want one thing understood here plainly. It has been intimated to me that because I have a resolution pending before the committee my motion to amend this bill is not respectful to the committee. Now, Mr. Chairman, no committee can justly make that charge, nor can any member of the committee make it. I want to say to you that the highest duty I conceive I have here, after my duty toward my country and its general prosperity, is to represent the wishes of the people who sent me here; and I esteem it one of my great duties to present to this House the wrongs that are now being inflicted upon a large number of honest settlers in California. And, whether any committee or all the committees may consider this disrespectful, I can not help it. There is no disrespect in it. Why, if that were so, every amendment offered to any bill upon that basis would be disrespectful.

Mr. LOUD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BOWERS of California. Certainly.

Mr. LOUD. Does the Attorney-General now hold that he has no right under the law to appoint special counsel in these cases?

Mr. BOWERS of California. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the Attorney-General says he has no special authority to appear in these cases, and that is the reason I introduced that resolution, directing him to appear, and I have now introduced this amendment in order that if that resolution passes, he may use a part of this appropriation to pay for assistants in these very cases if he finds it necessary.

Mr. LOUD. Does he hold that he has no legal right to appear?

Mr. BOWERS of California. I understand he held that he did not have any right, but is there any law forbidding him?

Mr. LOUD. I simply wanted to bring that out.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I do not know that there is any statute compelling or directing the Attorney-General to appear in these cases, or in cases where United States patents to land are questioned; but I know in other cases he does appear, where the right of the United States is questioned. I do not know by what law he is allowed to appear when an Indian's rights to land is threatened: but this House passed an appropriation paying for two lawyers at Los Angeles for defending Indians, when their titles to land were questioned. Is not a white man as good as an Indian?

Mr. LOUD. You do not compare white men to Indians, do you?

Mr. BOWERS of California. Well, no; not exactly. If these people were Indians, it would not have to appear before this House. They would get their rights, and an appropriation of $70,000 for farmers to teach them how to farm. You know that they are only white American citizens and have no rights this Congress is bound to respect.

Now, is it a fact that the Attorney-General is prohibited by law from appearing in these cases, where American citizens have gone upon public lands, complied with the law, obtained patents issued to them by the United States? And is it possible that when those patents are questioned, the great law officer of this country has no right to appear? He may appear in patent cases. He may appear for any corporation, railroad, or anything else, except for these settlers.

Where is there any such law prohibiting him? Show it to me. I want to introduce a bill before I go home to-day to repeal such an infamous law, if there is one. It seems inconceivable to me, Mr. Chairman, that the representatives of the people of the United States can refuse this amendment or authorization in this matter, for those settlers.

The matter was also referred to the Attorney-General. Here is his reply:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 9th instant.

It will be practicable for the Department to comply with the resolution as amended, that is, by directing the United States attorney for the southern district of California to take charge of the cases on behalf of the settlers or by the employment of special counsel for that purpose.

As you ask me for suggestions as to the form or substance of the resolution, I have taken the liberty of making those which appear on the original by interlineations in lead pencil. Lest you might have some difficulty in making them out, I inclose a typewritten copy of the resolution as thus altered.

Respectfully yours,

RICHARD OLNEY,
Attorney-General.

Hon. CASE BRODERICK,
House Judiciary Committee, House of Representatives.

You see, gentlemen, that it is your plain duty to do this. I have had read the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, saying that it will be an outrage if you do not do it. I have called attention also to the letter of the Attorney-General of the United States, saying that it is practicable, that he can do it, and sending a draft of an amendment making that resolution stronger. The resolution suggested by the Attorney-General is as follows:

Joint resolution providing for the assumption by the United States of the defense of the settlers in the United States courts in the case of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company vs. Certain Settlers on public lands in California.

Whereas the Southern Pacific Railroad Company has begun an action at law in the United States courts to dispossess a large number of settlers on public lands in California of their farms and homes; and

Whereas said settlers entered on said lands and made entries thereof in accordance with the laws of the United States, and many of them hold United States patents for said lands; and

Whereas the judge of the United States court at Los Angeles, Cal., has rendered a decision in said action by which said settlers, who in good faith purchased of the United States said lands, paying the price fixed by law for the same, relying upon the integrity of the Government, and believing, as they had a right to believe, that said lands were a part of the public domain as claimed by the Government, are in danger of losing their homes; and

Whereas the said settlers are about to appeal from the decision of the district judge to the United States court of appeals: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the United States will assume the defense of the settlers in said cases, and that the Attorney-General of the United States, by the United States attorney for the southern district of California, or by counsel specially appointed, is hereby authorized and directed to appear for said settlers in said cases and to do all acts and things necessary and proper to defend the titles of said settlers under patents of laws of the United States.

I appeal to the gentleman. I would like to have somebody who is going to object to this amendment explain why he objects; and why, of all men, the settlers upon the public lands shall not have assistance from the law officers of the Government?

Mr. Chairman, you know that it is the common people, the settlers, the American citizens, who have made this country what it is. These men have gone onto these desert lands and made homes there; have done all the work of opening lands which were not worth 5 cents an acre without their labor and enterprise. If these people can not be defended, if they have no rights, and if they can not appeal to the Attorney-General, the law officer of the Government, I do not think we have any use for an Attorney-General or law officer of this Government. [Applause.]

But your rich corporations can have all the assistance they require. The corporations can come in here and have, it seems, all they desire; but the common people have no rights here, and the law is made to operate against them. Why, you gentlemen of the Democratic party go on the stump and present the claims of your party as being the friends of the common people, the workingmen, and particularly the farmers; but when they come and only ask justice you tell them to go to the devil, that they have no rights in this Government.

I want to bring this matter up in such a manner that we shall have a vote upon it for the first time, because I believe the chairman can see that there is no point of order that can lie against this amendment. It does not increase the appropriations, and there is no new legislation in it. It is exactly in order, and all I ask now of members here is that I may have a vote, yes or no; are you in favor of the rights of the people, the common people, on the public lands, or are you against them, and shall we sit here and legislate for the benefit of the great cities, for corporations, and for Wall street? Why do you avoid this matter, and dodge this question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Perhaps it is proper for me to state, in reply to the gentleman from California——

Mr. BOWERS of California. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman has no time to reserve, Mr. Chairman, when he ceases to address the House.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I had ten minutes, I think.

Mr. CULBERSON. I say it is perhaps proper for me to observe that a resolution was offered by the gentleman from California and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I have the honor to be a member. That resolution has been discussed before the committee on several occasions, and we have about, as I think, come to the conclusion that the passage of the resolution introduced by the gentleman from California would establish a very hurtful precedent.

I think the committee are of the opinion that a resolution should be adopted which would authorize the Attorney-General to make an employment in one of these cases and test the question involved. It will be understood, Mr. Chairman, that the questions involved in these cases are precisely the same. It seems that this land was granted to the Southern Pacific Railroad years and years ago. After that the authorities of the Interior Department, or the Secretary of the Interior rather, concluded that this land grant had lapsed, and that it did not cover this section of country in which these controversies have risen.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Will the gentleman allow me there?

Mr. CULBERSON. Pardon me just now. I will answer any questions after awhile. Accordingly this land was opened to settlement, and the number of people who settled upon this land is somewhere about 1,200 or 1,500. Subsequently a suit had been instituted in the United States circuit court for the district of California and has been determined adversely to the claimants in that case.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I beg the gentleman's pardon, if he will allow me the time. He is mistaken.

Mr. CULBERSON. Very well. I understand that the trial in the court below was determined upon a demurrer. The court sustained the demurrer, and the defendant refused to plead over, and the case was appealed to the circuit court, at least, for that circuit, and it is now in that circuit pending as an appeal from the decision of the court below upon the demurrer, the defendant refusing to answer over. Now, the proposition of the gentleman from California was to authorize the Attorney-General to employ counsel in all of these cases, when the employment of counsel in one of these cases would have been entirely sufficient.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is all I want. All lawyers know that the settlement of one case settles all the remainder of like kind.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment is not so drawn. And, so far as I am individually concerned, I do not believe that there is any obligation on the Government to defend this title whatever. Of course patent is issued, and if the suit is determined adversely to the settler in the court of last resort, the Government ought to pay back the money with interest upon it. That is what I think. Now, I understand this resolution here provides that of the $20,000 proposed to be appropriated in this bill $5,000 is to be set apart to pay the attorney who may be employed in this case.

Mr. BOWERS of California. If the Attorney-General finds it necessary. None of it may be necessary.

Mr. CULBERSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the Attorney-General has already estimated that it will be necessary for Congress to appropriate $20,000 to enable him to employ special attorneys to aid the district attorneys throughout the United States; so if you cut from that $5,000 for this special purpose, then, of course, you create a deficiency which would have to be accounted for hereafter; and besides, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says he knows no reason why the Attorney-General should not employ counsel to appear in these cases.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I do not know that it is necessary.

Mr. CULBERSON. The gentleman ought to know that unless there is in some law which specially authorizes the Attorney-General to appear in a case, he can not do it unless the United States be a party to the suit. If the United States were a party to this suit, then it would be the duty of the Attorney-General to direct the district attorney to appear and make defense; but this is a suit of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against the citizens.

Mr. BOWERS of California. This is really the case of the United States.

Mr. CULBERSON. The United States is not a party to it.

Mr. BOWERS of California. But it affects all the same class of lands they now claim, and are selling to-day.

Mr. CULBERSON. The United States gave patents to the land. This is not an application to pay back this money to the settlers on it, and there can not be such a claim until the fact is shown that they have lost the land by the judgment of the court of last resort.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I hope the gentleman will allow me a minute before he gets through, so that I may correct his statement with reference to these cases. That case was tried on a demurrer. That demurrer was overruled. They were allowed to file a new one, and the new trial has been held in this case at the court of Los Angeles, and the decision has not been rendered. It has gone no farther; but which ever way it goes the case will go to the Supreme Court of the United States. Just one word further. I know that the gentleman from Texas wants to give the whole truth.

This is not land-grant land except that they are lieu lands. They are on the ten-mile indemnity limits for lands that were found to be mineral; and they were taken as lieu lands, and the settlers have been on them for ten, fifteen, and twenty years. They were opened equally to railroad selection and the citizens; and your Department holds them so to-day. Now, on the question as to whether the United States is a party to this suit. They are claiming that land to-day, and they are selling that land to-day, and granting patents for it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Who is?

Mr. BOWERS of California. The United States; the Interior Department.

Mr. CULBERSON. Do I understand you to say that the railroad company has no claim to this land?

Mr. BOWERS of California. Only to the extent that they might have been selected by the railroad company in the ten-mile limit of lieu lands in place of sections in the original grant found to be mineral lands, but the company did not make these selections until after they were occupied by settlers.

Mr. CULBERSON. Are the railroads possessed of any claim to the lands unless suit is brought simply to have the authority or the foundation for any claim?

Mr. BOWERS of California. They have no authority there. This land was thrown open to settlement through the orders of the Department.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask my colleague a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like the attention of the gentleman from Texas. The Chair was inclined to the opinion that this amendment was germane, and was not included within the limitations which would make it out of order on an appropriation bill; but that might depend, perhaps, upon the question as to whether or not the Attorney-General of the United States is authorized by law to employ counsel in any particular case.

Mr. CULBERSON. He is authorized to employ special counsel to assist the Attorney-General in certain cases.

The CHAIRMAN. That is just the question.

Mr. CULBERSON. But it will be observed this is a case in which the Government of the United States is not a party, and therefore the Attorney-General says he has no authority to appear.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will allow the Chair to inquire where is the law that authorizes the Attorney-General to employ counsel? Does this amendment limit his authority in that respect?

Mr. LANE. If I correctly remember, the provision of law will be found in section 362 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] to the fact that in a case in the State of Iowa, in which the circumstances were very similar to those here, the Fifty-first Congress authorized an appropriation to enable the Attorney-General to employ special counsel to appear in the case. That was the case of settlers on the Des Moines River lands, the question involved being very similar to that involved here.

Mr. CULBERSON. That confirms exactly what I say—that the Attorney-General without special law has no authority to do anything of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the section which has been referred to by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE].

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 362. The Attorney-General shall exercise general superintendence and direction over the attorneys and marshals of all the districts in the United States and the Territories as to the manner of discharging their respective duties; and the several district attorneys and marshals are required to report to the Attorney-General an account of their official proceedings, and of the state and condition of their respective offices, in such time and manner as the Attorney-General may direct.

Mr. CULBERSON. There is a provision of law authorizing and directing the President to have appearance made in all cases in which the Government of the United States is a party.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to see that provision of the statute.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will look it up.

Mr. LANE. The Attorney-General himself holds that he has no authority to appear in these cases. This amendment itself confesses the fact. The gentleman who advocates the amendment concedes the fact in his argument. Now, if there is no authority for the employment of counsel without the adoption of this amendment, then it changes existing law; there is no doubt about that.

The CHAIRMAN. If what the gentleman assumes to be true is a fact, his position is correct; but is that the case?

Mr. LANE. That is the confession here. Let us see how this matter comes here. The Government many years ago patented these lands to the railroad company; afterward it patented the same lands to these private parties. Now, what does the patent in the latter case amount to? It is an absolute nullity. And when the Government makes a patent to a party it does not give a warranty that it will defend the title of the grantee in the patent.

Mr. BOWERS of California. But the Government claims the rest of these lands, and is selling them to-day.

Mr. LANE. I am talking about the lands to which these parties lay claim. The Government gave patents to these 1,500 people. If the Government owned the land the patent is valid: if it did not, it is a nullity. The Government does not warrant the title of the grantee in such cases.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Suppose the Government of the United States comes in and asserts title to the land?

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is just what it does.

Mr. DOLLIVER. In that case does not the law authorize the Department of Justice to begin action to establish the title of the Government? Can not that be done without any change of the law at all?

Mr. LANE. Certainly, in such a case as the gentleman supposes; but the Government does not claim this land at all.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understand from my friend from California that the Government now asserts title to this land.

Mr. LANE. No, sir.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is exactly what it does.

Mr. LANE. The railroad company claiming these lands filed an action of ejectment, alleging in their declaration that they were the owners of the land. That is what the record shows. These parties who had settled upon the lands came in and filed a demurrer; and on that demurrer the court rendered judgment to the effect that the railroad company owned the lands.

Now, there is not money enough in the world to defeat a judgment of that kind. These parties, by refusing to plead the general issue, by failing to deny the state of facts alleged in the declaration, and by allowing the suit to go to judgment upon the demurrer, practically confessed that the railroad company owned the lands. Now, the gentleman from California wants this Government to intervene in behalf of these parties and defend 1,500 lawsuits. The Government has no right to defend a suit against a citizen. If the Government is going to defend these people, then it must make defense in all similar cases.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the gentleman hold that the Government, having issued a patent to a citizen for a tract of land, is entirely discharged from all liability, equitable or legal, to defend the title of the grantee?

Mr. LANE. I say that if the patent is void the whole thing is void.

Mr. DOLLIVER. But ought not the Government to interest itself to establish the validity of its own conveyance?

Mr. LANE. I do not see how the Government can acknowledge such an obligation in this case when it does not acknowledge it in others. In issuing its patent it does not guarantee title.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair intimated an impression a few moments ago that this amendment might be in order as a condition or limitation upon the appropriation embraced in the bill. On further examination, however, the Chair finds that the amendment proposes to change an existing law—section 363 of the Revised Statutes, which authorizes the Attorney-General, "whenever in his opinion the public interests may require it, to employ and retain in the name of the United States such attorneys as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties." This amendment proposes to authorize the Attorney-General to employ special counsel to defend certain cases pending between private individuals in the State of California. As this would give to the Attorney-General power which he has not now under general law, the amendment would evidently be a change of existing law; and therefore the point of order is sustained.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LESTER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EDMUNDS, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BLACK of Illinois, for ten days from the 28th instant, on account of important business.

BADGE OF ARMY AND NAVY UNION.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which I think will occupy but a minute. It does not involve any expenditure whatever.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 123) authorizing the wearing of the distinctive badge adopted by the Regular Army and Navy Union upon all occasions of ceremony.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the distinctive badge adopted by the Regular Army and Navy Union of the United States may be worn, in their own right, upon all occasions of ceremony by officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy of the United States who are members of said organization.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution just read?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is no written report, though the Committee on Military Affairs considered this measure and authorized a report. This organization, the Regular Army and Navy Union, is composed of officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army and Navy. Its purpose is to assist in preserving order and discipline and also to promote social relations. In addition to that, it is charitable in its operations. It buries the dead members of the association and takes care of their dependent relatives. It resembles in its general character and work the Grand Army; but it is composed, as I have said, of officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy.

Mr. LOUD. What is its badge?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Well, it has a button and a badge somewhat similar to that of the Grand Army; but the resemblance is not close enough to cause anyone to mistake the one for the other.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire to move an amendment, which has been agreed to by the committee, to insert before the word "occasions," in line 5, the word "public."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. OUTHWAITE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE WILLIAM H. ENOCHS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. OUTHWAITE). The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, the 17th day of March, from 2 o'clock in the afternoon, be set apart for the purpose of paying eulogies to the late Hon. W. H. Enochs.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I call for the reading of the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. William H. Enochs, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the public services and private character of the deceased be thoroughly commemorated.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and send a duly attested copy to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, That at the conclusion of these services the House, as a further mark of respect, do adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, William H. Enochs was born in Noble County, Ohio, March 29, 1842, and died in the city of Ironton, his home, on Thursday morning, the 13th day of July, 1893.

Of his parents I knew but little, and that only by common report. They were people in moderate or possibly poor circumstances, and the boy was compelled to work on the farm in aid of his father and to secure a living for himself. The father and mother of Enochs are said to have been persons possessing more than ordinary strength of character. They were of pious minds and very industrious and upright people.

Young Enochs made good headway in the schools which he attended, being for the early years of his student life simply the common schools of Lawrence County, Ohio, to which section his parents had removed. He taught school and with the proceeds of that employment attended the Ohio University at Athens, at my home. The impression he made upon the people of my town and upon the faculty of the college was that Enochs was a handsome, well-behaved, ambitious young man with country manners and country tendencies. His deportment as a student was such as to challenge the approval of the professors, and he made an impression upon the people of the town which made them ever afterwards his friends.

It can hardly be said of him that he manifested distinguishing traits of character, but he did manifest satisfactory traits of character. He was manly, upright, industrious, courageous, and conformed to the rules of the college and the customs of the town to the entire satisfaction of his friends.

Young Enochs was a student at the Ohio University in the spring of 1861, when the war broke out. In giving his early experience he was in the habit of saying that when the war began he followed the first fife and drum that came along. The notes of that fife and drum are still sounding in my memory. It was on the evening of the Sunday following the attack upon Fort Sumter that the first meeting to express the opinion of that college town upon the great subject of rebellion and war was held in the town of Athens, and young Enochs was there. I still remember the glow on his face and the light in his eye as the news from Washington was read and resolutions to contribute men and money were adopted.

Very shortly afterwards he enlisted in the Twenty-second Ohio Volunteers for three months. That regiment, like many others from Ohio, was organized under the Seward theory of a sixty-days' termination of the war, but long before the end of the sixty days it was plainly visible to the intelligent eye that we had embarked in a war of years, and the young soldier re-enlisted at Ceredo, W. Va., in the Fifth West Virginia Volunteers, in Company K.

He had seen three months' service. He was finely formed and a soldierly looking young man, and it has been well said of him that he was a boy in blue all over.

As a soldier he was a dashing soldier. I never heard that he made plans of action, but I have heard that he always acted. He became a lieutenant in December, 1861, and on April 19, 1862, he was promoted to captain of Company E, and on August 17, 1863, he became lieutenant-colonel, which rank he held until December 19, 1864, when he was promoted to colonel of the First West Virginia Regiment, into which the Fifth and Ninth had been consolidated. This position he held until the close of the war, and after the war Col. Enochs was brevetted brigadier-general in honor of his honorable services on the field.

The regiments with which Gen. Enochs served performed substantial and valuable military services. They were in the prominent battles of Cross Keys, Bull Run, Winchester, Opequon, Cloud Mountain, Lynchburg, Cedar Creek, and Fisher Hill.

I think it can be said of him as a soldier that he was a good fighter. With all the vicissitudes of politics and personal matters I never heard a word of detraction in regard to the military record of this gallant man. His characteristics as a soldier, in addition to those to which I have already alluded, was a special adaptation to skirmish fighting. He had a way of getting a little further out than the average man on the skirmish line and ascertaining a little more about the enemy's position than the average man.

He was an uneducated, untrained, and undisciplined Phil Sheridan. He had all the ardor of that great leader, all the push, all the courage, all the patriotic devotion. He was lacking, of course, as we all were, in skill, in training, and in theories.

The soldier of 1861 was the ideal soldier of the war. On more than one occasion I have done, in my way, and with my ability, full justice to the men of all ranks, and all terms of service who did what they could to put down the rebellion, and I have not drawn lines of demarkation between the three-years man and the four-years man, and any other man who did honorable service. But after all, there is to my mind a special halo around the men of 1861. There is something in the men who heard the gun of Fort Sumter in all its enormous reverberations and appreciated in some measure the terrible importance of that awful shock and hastened with all proper speed and promptness, anxious to accept the gage of war and meet the shock of battle.

It was the soldier of 1861 who did not measure consequences or weigh results. His country was assailed and he knew it, and that was all he wanted to know. He did not inquire the rate of compensation or the amount of pension he was to receive. He never thought of it. He looked about him to make some arrangements for those who depended upon him, shouldered his musket as the men of Lexington and Concord shouldered theirs, and marched with a purpose and determination as heroic as was the sacrifices of the men at Valley Forge and Yorktown.

Such a man was William H. Enochs. Full honor for services in the field will always be awarded his memory by his comrades of the war and by the people who knew him.

He studied law after the war, and graduated at the Cincinnati law school in 1866. He began the practice of law in West Virginia, but after about a year he removed to Ironton, where he lived the remainder of his life.

In the latter years of his law practice he devoted much time to railroad practice and in that connection was an industrious, energetic, enterprising, and ambitious lawyer.

He was elected to the Legislature of Ohio in 1869 and served a single term, and voluntarily withdrew from politics for the time being.

As a lawyer little need be said beyond the fact that he was industrious, persevering, and ambitious. He stood well at the bar, and in the lines of his profession which he pursued he was successful. As a citizen he was an aggressive friend of Ironton and the section in which he lived.

He had intelligent views on business affairs, and as he had been in the war so he was in peace, on the skirmish line of enterprise and business aggression.

He was a candidate for Congress in 1888, but failed to receive the nomination, but in 1890, after one of the most exciting struggles ever known in that section of Ohio, he was nominated for Congressman. The district had been newly formed. It consisted of the counties of Athens and Meigs, Gallia, Lawrence, and Scioto. Three of the counties had come from the old Eleventh district and two from the Fifteenth district, and had been thrown together in the new Twelfth district.

As thus constituted the new district had two members of Congress, both of whom were candidates, and both of whom were supported, with great pertinacity by the delegations from two counties, but the loyal and untiring support given to Gen. Enochs by his own county of Lawrence carried the day for him, and he was nominated, and although he had received the nomination at the end of an unparalleled struggle, which lasted five days, in two different conventions, an adjournment having been taken from one city to another and a period of two months having intervened—so satisfactory was his nomination that no man ever received a more loyal support than he received in all the counties of the district and by all the men of his party everywhere.

Of his services connected with the Fifty-second Congress, others will speak. Those who served with him in this Hall can best describe his character in Congress.

Of him it can be truthfully said that he was careful and considerate of and attentive to the wants of his district. He was a faithful representative of local interests and made warm friends among the members of Congress, and received the approval of a new constituency in a Congressional district which was practically that in which he had long lived, by being renominated by acclamation and elected by an overwhelming majority to the Fifty-third Congress, but before that body assembled the messenger came and the soul of this gallant and distinguished soldier and faithful citizen was removed from earth to join the great majority of his comrades of the war on the other shore.

On Fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that I can not better discharge my duty to my dead colleague in this behalf than to incorporate in my remarks the eloquent and beautiful address of Rev. W. B. Marsh, delivered at the funeral of Mr. Enochs:

COMRADES: To-day Ohio mourns a heroic and devoted son, a man whose career recorded would furnish a part of the vital history of our commonwealth and nation, and whose character had elements worthy of painstaking analysis.

I regret that the brevity enforced by this mournful occasion will permit so little liberty on my part in this direction.

It is perhaps fitting that he who lived so modestly and carried himself as a son of the people and a brother and comrade of every man should be laid away with simplest obsequies; public, only because the public know that they are always at home on the grounds and in the home of Gen. Enochs. This great assembly has convened spontaneously to swell the one sad acclaim of family friends and old comrades in arms.

Our distinguished friends from abroad, representing both commonwealth and nation, are here in discharge of no mere perfunctory duty, but to blend their testimony with ours that we have lost not only a great citizen, but a friend and a brother.

The impressive lessons that always find their way to honest hearts concerning life and immortality have been abundantly suggested and have found expression in the more impressive language of song and prayer and of holy Scripture. No long exhortations can deepen or enhance what is borne in upon our souls so solemnly and affectingly. The spirit of Duty stands at the head of the bier and the spirit of Love at its foot, and they point us to the noble dead as one worthy to be a leader still along the path of a devoted and patriotic life.

The elder ages were distinguished by contrasting extremes of human character and destiny. God seemed not to care except for mighty men, and to use mankind as but a base soil out of which to grow heroes. We have now entered a new age, a second act in this drama of the divine purposes. Now the word has gone forth from the throne to "make a highway for the people." "Every mountain now shall be made low, and every valley shall be exalted," not to secure the level of mediocrity, but the grade of the sublime.

God purposed and purposes to make all men his people and to make all his people prophets. He planned of old through the hero as an individual to raise up a race of men of heroic mould. I eschew purposely the cant phrases of a socialism that is ignorant and pretentious, and that seeks progress by debasing high things rather than by a great continental elevation. But the era has dawned and is now crescent whose commanding purpose is the perfection of society, of man as an order, rather than of man as an individual.

It is now often said by the frowning pessimist that the day of great men is passed; that our age has not and can not produce the hero; that in politics, and in literature, and in art, and in religion excellence is no longer attainable.

"Great is mediocrity," seems to their ears the watchword of the nineteenth century democracy. But these men misinterpret the method of the divine progress and evolution.

The supreme care for many ages did indeed seem expended to produce a few men worthy of being called after God's name. Single personalities looming up in the midst of a low level of degraded humanity, men supereminent quite as much by reason of the depression of their surroundings as by their celestial altitude.

But thus God has sought to secure first the piers of the great bridge, afterwards to cast athwart the chasm the mighty cable. Joshua and David, Hezekiah and Ezra are buttresses of the King's highway, Enoch and Moses and Elijah are Gibral ar fortresses, at once frowning over and protecting the low-lying plains and exposed seas of humanity.

But God seeks now quite other things. And with this change or maturity of plan arises a new exigency. The qualities now to crown the superior man are quite different. He must still be brave and loving and honest of purpose and self-devoted.

But now he must partake of the new spirit of a divine social democracy. Now, the question is not how elevated a man is in his separate personality, but how well does he fill his place in the social organism.

His very success in this will serve to hide from the undiscerning the superb quality of his influence. The great man to-day, to fulfill God's present purpose, must be like leaven endowed with mighty but secretly working powers of human sympathies, not a measuring rod to show people how small they are beside the Colossus.

The most conspicuous gift of the men of the new age is a certain spirit of human brotherliness—comraderie. The solemn obeisance, the prostration of the body, the stately inclination of the proud head, the formal salute, may indicate respect or official subserviency or recognition of social equality. But the grasp of the hand through which pulsates the blood of a warm heart, the beaming eye which tells of sympathy and interest and common rights—this is the symbol of comradeship.

There is a gift in it. You can not impart it or imitate it. It is more than an art—it is a mystery—how an honest, cordial man, feeling himself as in the same boat of destiny with you, and glad of it, can impart somewhat of his very soul to you in the way he grasps your hand. There are political handshakings and ministerial handshakings, but they are as far removed from that of which I speak as society kisses are from the kiss a mother presses upon her baby's lips.

Gen. Enochs had this rare gift of deep and honest cordiality. To shake hands with him was an acquaintance. A throb of human brotherliness came across that bridge. He did not need to say that he liked you or wanted to help you. He made no professions of extraordinary friendship, but felt himself that he was your comrade and ready to share anything that he had, good gifts or perilous service.

Social philosophers have a great deal to say about equality. The word and the thought are poisoned with the leaven of selfishness.

There are two forms of greed, that which by night and opportunity appropriates all it can get—this is the greed of the pen and the sty. The other is the greed that scans your neighbor's plate or in famine weighs out his rations; a greed too weak to rob computes relative advantages and offsets even the gifts of friendship. This is civilized greed, but greed it is still. The doctrine of social equality is selfishness armed with yardstick and scissors, butcher knife and scales.

High above this goddess of the Paris commune the spirit of comradeship sits cloud-enthroned.

Comradeship consists with largest divergence of gift and possession. Your superior officer, your commander, may be your comrade. If more highly endowed, if more highly favored, he says by look and action, "Take what you need; ask what you will; let me help you if I can."

The grandest comradeship of the ages was that of Jesus with his chosen twelve.

May the time never come when we shall have a mechanical, mathematical equality. But may the day be hastened when the rich and the poor, the highly endowed and the ignorant, the strong and the weak, shall be able to grasp hands, saying, more than "we are equals," more even than "we are brethren," better, "we are comrades."

We bear to his grave to-day a man worthy of superior honor. He won his place not by home influence, not by advantages of birth and inherited wealth, not by political intrigue nor by favor in high places, but by sheer force of innate manhood.

Gen. Enochs, transplanted to other ages, would have won his way to the front, and might have gained the deceptive luster which now in our eyes irradiates the mighty men of the elder ages. But the glory of our friend is that he was true knight of this dawning day of human brotherhoods.

He was alive with the very spirit of the age. His sword was tipped with divine fire from off Liberty's altar, and he was baptized in the rising flood of that great sea which is ere long to wipe away human wrong.

We honor him for attainments and for achievements in camp and field and legislative halls. But most of all do we honor and hail the memory of one who never for a moment forgot he was one of the people, not ashamed to be our brother and our comrade.

This quality gives impress to the style of patriotism of this new age.

I greatly honor the name of George Washington. In the ranks of heroes he stands preëminent; but from his cradle he was instructed to think of himself as a superior being, quite above the low-lying level of ordinary citizenship. His love of country was passionate, his self-devotion was perfect, but always self-conscious. There was always the patronizing air, "see how dignified and great I am, and yet how unreservedly I give up all for love of country." In this, in a degree, Clay and Webster were like their great prototype. Undoubted patriots and brave men, they all, but possessed somewhat of the spirit of Kaiser William the Third, who bids his people trust him as he trusts God. A hero of this type poses—attitudinizes.

Our age has made an advance, not a retrograde, in producing men like Sheridan and Hayes and Enochs, who rode at the head of their columns and said not "boys go in," but "boys come on." I have read history, all I could get my hands on. My boyhood was thrilled with fancies from the bloody scenes of ancient heroism. But never in all the history of the race have men fought with the abandon of uncalculating bravery as up and down the marches of the Shenandoah Valley. I saw the Wilderness, and Spottsylvania, and Cold Harbor, but momentous as was the struggle and unflinching the courage, yet Winchester and its approaches saw deeds of personal prowess of the highest order known among men. I speak as one who had exceptional advantages of seeing both these scenes of tremendous achievement from a vantage ground and without the personal preferences and prejudices which might warp the judgment.

I can see as in vision a scene described to me by Gen. Enochs only a few weeks ago with a purely incidental intention of illustrating a matter to which I need not now refer.

Hayes, injured by a fall, his horse having just been shot under him, lies with his head in Enoch's lap, his face turned away from the scene of disaster then fast hastening on to panic. In the distance arises the cloud of dust whose center, like the core of a cyclone, contained the foaming charger of Phil Sheridan, nearing the goal of his historic ride. "Boys, are you whipped?" "No, we are ready, waiting," is the prompt reply. Victory flaps his wings over the illustrious trio, before whom Achilles and his band of Greeks were play heroes. It is not often in modern warfare that personal prowess of a handful of men turns the scales of destiny and wrings victory out of defeat.

But the best thing of it all was that this heroism was not a mere parade of physical prowess; it was championship of great principles. The Greek poet represents the very gods as enlisted in the fight around ancient Troy, and performing heroic deeds in aid of their favorites. And the Hebrew bard declares that the very "stars in their courses fought against Sisera." We believe that not nature alone or lower potencies of celestial good or evil were arrayed, but that Jehovah of Hosts marshaled our armies in contest on which hung the fate of a continent and the destiny of a race. And the echoes of the battle for union and liberty will resound through the valleys and hills of Virginia till the archangel's trump shall sound. Great was the arena, observed of men and angels the contest, and enduring the victory. A new peace has assumed royal away, not clad in robes of oriental effeminacy, but with victory-crowned brow. And so evermore.

God give us peace, not such as lulls to sleep,
But sword on thigh and brow with purpose knit.
And let our ship of state to harbor sweep,
Her ports all up, her battle lanterns lit,
And her leashed thunders gathering for their leap.

And evermore God give us men, true to the high ideal and true to the illustrious type, seeking to fulfill their destiny as sons of a great republic.

There are many things we would be glad to say in further portraiture of the noble band of men, "some of whom have crossed the flood and some are crossing now," but it is not meet.

We believe that God who had need of Samson and of Jephtha—of the strong and of the valiant—as well as need of Moses the devout and Samuel the spiritual, had and has still a place in His kingdom for these men of mighty deeds. They have worked out their salvation in somewhat diverse fashion from many who have been types more approved of mother church; but beneath all has been the same sterling spirit of faith in God and sublime devotion to duty which under any form and guise constitute the bone and muscle of true religion.

Happy the moralist whose training and breadth of view enable him to tell a man when he sees one.

Wise the religious teacher who has learned to discount pretentious saintliness, with its marble polish, and to pause in admiration before elements in character of granite and iron. Marble is good for grand balconies and for tombstones; granite and iron make foundation stones and anchors.

The noblest work of God and highest study of man are found within the compass of a brave soul.

It took the Almighty more than ten milleniums to make a man, and then He was not satisfied with him. "It repented God that He had made man," naively says the ancient chronicler.

Failure we know there can be none. When God breaks old molds of life it is not because He has tried and failed, but because He has used the molds and fulfilled their purpose and wishes to clear the field for a higher product. So God made man, or is making him.

There is room and scope for grander things, both for the race here and for the individual in the free and glorious kingdom beyond.

We point not to Gen. Enochs's life and character and say, "Behold the perfect man," but rather "Behold what broad foundations the master builder has laid for temple or for palace."

Unpretentious, sincere, brave, brotherly, reverent of God, and a lover of all men was he.

The battle of life is ended and, as in many another battle, the victor is the victim—the fallen is the hero in the strife.

We bless God that this is but the earthward view. And standing on these green shores, if penetrate we may the mysterious void through which he has passed, we rend the heavens with our salute. Comrade, well done!

In addition to this I will embody in my address an editorial written by his friend, and which I believe accurately describes his services to the country.

It is as follows:

Gen. Enochs was born near Middleburg, in Noble County, March 29, 1842, making him 51 years of age last March. His parents were Henry and Jane Miller Enochs.

He was reared on his father's farm and attended the common schools in winter with the advantage, however, of one term at the Ohio University. When Fort Sumter was fired upon he was a student at the Ohio University, and on the 19th of April, 1861, he entered in Company B, Twenty-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry; soon after he was promoted to corporal and sent to guard the railroad between Marietta and Parkersburg, thence to West Virginia, participating in the numerous marches and skirmishes of his command, and the battle of Rich Mountain. He was promoted to fourth sergeant, and in that rank was mustered out of the service July 24, 1861. He at once reënlisted in Company K, Fifth West Virginia Infantry, an organization composed almost wholly of Ohio men.

In October he was elected captain of his company, but owing to his youth the colonel of the regiment refused to recommend him for a captain's commission, and he was made first lieutenant of the company. His drill and discipline soon attracted the attention of the army officers, and he was frequently complimented for the manner in which he had brought up the company. His regiment was organized and camped at Ceredo, W. Va. Rebel regiments were also being organized within a few miles of its camp, the surrounding country swarmed with bushwhackers, and his company and regiment was in active service from the time of their enlistment. In the winter of 1862, the regiment was ordered to Parkersburg. Soon after Lieut. Enochs was sent with his company to New Creek Station and assigned to the command of that outpost. At this time there was a vacancy in the majorship of the regiment, and Lieut. Enochs was recommended by the officers of the regiment for the position, but again his youth prevented his preferment, and he was promoted to captain and assigned to Company E. This company soon became the best drilled and disciplined company in the regiment, and in the spring of 1862, led the advance at the battle of Moorfield, participating in all its marches and skirmishes along the South Branch of the Potomac, including the battle of McDowell, May 8 1862.

Returning to Moorfield, the regiment crossed the mountains with the army under Gens. Schenck and Milroy, striking the rear of the Confederate army under Stonewall Jackson, where the regiment was engaged. The Union armies, united under Gen. Frémont, followed Jackson up the Shenandoah Valley, skirmishing and fighting day and night until the battle of Cross Keys, June 8, 1862, when Jackson crossed the river under cover of night, burning the bridge behind him; Frémont's army went down the valley. Schenck's division and Gen. Milroy's brigade (to which the regiment then belonged) marched from Luray Valley across the Blue Ridge and joined the Army of Northern Virginia, commanded by Gen. John Pope. The division was assigned to the Eleventh Corps, then commanded by Gen. Franz Sigel. The regiment participated in numerous skirmishes, until the terrible battle of Cedar Mountain was fought, which was one of the most desperate battles of the war.

The regiment afterwards participated in the battles along the Rapidan and Rappahannock Rivers, including Freeman's Ford and Sulphur Spring, being under fire every day for about twenty days. In the first day of the second battle of Manassas, although the junior captain of the regiment, Capt. Enochs was in command. The regiment went into the fight near the stone house, and in the woods some distance beyond the regiment fought almost the entire two days of the battle over the possession of the railroad cut in the woods. The cut was taken and retaken until one-fourth of the regiment was either killed, wounded, or missing.

History has never given the facts concerning this battle; the loss and disaster to the Union Army there has never been told.

The regiment next participated in the battle of Chantilly. In all these marches, skirmishes, and battles Capt. Enochs took an active part, being in command of either his company or the regiment.

After the battle of Chantilly the regiment being almost entirely destroyed, was ordered to the fortifications around Washington to obtain shoes and clothing. Soon afterwards it was transferred to the Kanawha Valley, West Virginia.

In the spring of 1863 it was ordered to Gauley Bridge, on the Kanawha, where it remained the greater portion of the year, scouting and skirmishing through the mountains of that country. August 17, 1863, Capt. Enochs was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the regiment. May 4, 1864, his command broke camp and started toward Louisburg, W. Va.

At Meadow Bluffs it joined the army under Gen. George Crook, and crossed the mountains, destroying the railroads and bridges. It joined the army under Gen. Hunter at Stanton, Va., and under that gentleman made the raid upon Lynchburg. In its endeavor to get into Lynchburg, Col. Enochs with his regiment charged the breastworks, but was repulsed and driven back with heavy loss. The Union Army was compelled to retreat to the Kanawha Valley. This was one of the longest and hardest raids of the war. It was, as the general has stated it, "days and nights of marching, starving, and fighting."

The regiment remained but a short time in the Kanawha Valley, when it was ordered to Harpers Ferry and the Shenandoah Valley. The army started up the valley, fighting the rebels at Bunkers Hill, July 19, 1864, and at Barters Farm, July 20, 1864, and at Winchester, July 24. The Union army was driven north of the Potomac River and soon became a part of the army under Gen. Sheridan, and under him was in the battles near Halltown, Va., August 22, 23, and 24, 1864. At the battle of Berryville, September 3, 1864, Col. Enochs' regiment made a brilliant charge on a Mississippi brigade of four regiments, driving them from the field and capturing a number of prisoners. At the battle of Winchester, September 19, 1864, Col. Enochs' regiment was in the front on the extreme right of the Union army. Shortly after going into the fight the rebels were found behind the stone walls on the opposite side of a deep slough; the regiment waded through and charged the rebels, driving them from their chosen positions until their fortifications were reached.

In this charge Col. Enochs was severely wounded when within 100 yards of the fortifications, a ball striking him in the head and cutting through a heavy felt hat. He was supposed to have been instantly killed, and was left where he fell. During the night he was conducted to his regiment, and the next morning was again in command, following the retreating rebels toward Fishers Hill, which point they had strongly fortified. September 22, Col. Enochs was given charge of the advance, which climbed the mountain and got in the rear of their works before they were discovered. When the signal was given, the whole army charged the fortifications, capturing most of the enemy's artillery and routing their army. The regiment under Col. Enochs participated in numerous other skirmishes up to the battle of Cedar Creek.

For gallant and meritorious services during this campaign Col. Enochs was brevetted general, being the youngest man of his rank in the army of the Potomac. During this service his regiment had become so depleted that it was consolidated with the Ninth West Virginia, and was afterwards known as the First West Virginia Veteran Infantry.

The regiment remained in the valley under Gen. Hancock until near the close of the war, when it was sent to Cumberland, Md., where Col. Enochs was assigned to the command of the department of Maryland, and on March 13, 1865, he was commissioned brigadier-general.

Gen. Enochs was a partisan in politics. He belonged to the Republican party. He believed in the principles and the policy of that party, and while he had the fullest toleration for the opinions of others at all times, yet he believed that it was the duty of that party at all times, and under all circumstances, to recognize and reward the services of the men who had made the Republican party great, strong, and powerful in the country, and I honor him for it. If he were to be tried on this occasion by the touchstone of the doctrinaire or by the professor of modern political methods of the East, or the South, or the West, he would fall far short of receiving the approval of such pharisaical judges; but if he were to be tried by the standard of the men who have gone before him, and who made the party to which he belonged a great party, and impressed its principles upon the statute books of this country, and wrote them in indelible words of living light in the organic law of this land, he would stand par excellence a man to be honored by his successors in the Republican party.

There was nothing about him that suggested the idea that he was ashamed of the men who had made him prominent in Ohio politics. I was willing to recognize the instrumentalities he was willing to use.

Mr. Speaker, I attended his funeral at Ironton. On a beautiful Sunday we assembled at the home he loved so well and witnessed the ceremonies incident to that solemn occasion. I never witnessed a greater demonstration of the love, affection, confidence, and esteem of a great constituency than was manifested at the bier of Gen. Enochs on that occasion.

For many hours people came, not alone from the Ohio counties around him, but from across the river, and for miles from many directions a great column of sorrowing people; and as I sat and witnessed the slow-moving pageant as it passed by the remains of Gen. Enochs, and saw the tears welling from the eyes of the prosperous, the strong, the poor, and the humble, the masses of citizens who had known him all his life, I felt that surely there was some quality about this gallant soldier and tried citizen that made him the especial idol and favorite of the population. It was a high testimonial to his worth and standing as a man and citizen.

Gen. Enochs was most happy in his domestic relations. He married a wife possessed of bright intelligence and praiseworthy ambition, clothed as with a garment with the beautiful womanly qualities of modesty, energy, and courage; and to her, as much as to any other incident of his life, he owed the progress which he made. She had been to him a friend, monitor, and counselor. Faithful to the last, with a heart almost breaking, she stood at the grave of her husband, proud of his history, grateful for the sympathy manifested on every side, and took up the burden of his life where he had laid it down to see to it that the splendid boy that he left behind him should be, in some measure at least, a representative of the good qualities of his father.

Just as the funeral cortege was entering the beautiful burying place, peals of thunder and vivid flashes of lightning from massive storm clouds rolling above startled the great audience, and for many minutes a display of electrical power such as is scarcely ever witnessed in that climate took place, and I felt as though it were a fitting tribute to a life that had been stormy but successful, a life that had been almost like a meteor flashing amid the surrounding clouds that had environed his pathway through life. Coming up, as he had, from humble life, he had written his name upon the records of his State in a way never to be erased, and this was the end. It was the end of a distinguished citizen, and these ceremonies to-day are but to remind those who come after that the reward of faithful service is the token of respect by the citizens of the community. These ceremonies can not do good to him, for—

> Can storied urn, or animated bust,
> Back to its mansion call the fleeting breath?
> Can honor's voice provoke the silent dust,
> Or flatt'ry soothe the dull, cold ear of death?

No; but we can place above his tomb the chaplet of our honor, our love, our affection, our recognition. And the lesson comes to us to-day with great effect that we are passing away, that we are passing off the stage of action; that the places that now know us will soon be filled by others, and the admonition is that we so conduct ourselves here that hereafter we may meet the reward of the just upon the other side; that in the great hereafter our Father will say come up higher.

In the grave all achievements of an earthly nature end. The lesson that comes to us is:

> The boast of heraldry, the pomp of pow'r,
> And all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave,
> Await alike the inevitable hour,
> The paths of glory lead but to the grave.

And if our lives are to end thus, life indeed were not worth living. Our hope or belief, our faith goes out to a higher, better, purer, and eternal life.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, prior to the meeting of the Fifty-second Congress, of which the late Gen. William H. Enochs was a member, I had no personal acquaintance with him. He was not, however, unknown to me by reputation; and I had heard him spoken of as a gentleman of ability, and a soldier who had served with distinction in the late war for the suppression of the rebellion. But on the meeting of the Fifty-second Congress, in December, 1891, I soon became personally acquainted with Gen. Enochs, and as I met him here in this Hall from day to day I learned to respect and admire him for his many manly qualities and for his ability and patriotism.

It is not an easy matter, Mr. Speaker, for a member of this body to take a very prominent position in his first term; but from my first acquaintance with Gen. Enochs, and from my observation of his service during the Fifty-second Congress, he impressed me as a gentleman of ability and of good character, genial and pleasant in his intercourse with his fellow-members, and attentive to the proceedings of the House. I know that in all matters of local interest to his constituents and his State he was attentive, earnest, and faithful in looking after them.

From frequent conversations with Gen. Enochs I knew that he was not in good health during his service in Congress, and especially during the last session of his service, when he felt great anxiety as to his health and at times was very despondent. If he did not say so in words, he made the impression upon my mind that he did not expect to live long. Hence, while I deeply regretted the sad event, I was not surprised to hear of his death.

But, Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to speak at length upon the life and character of Gen. Enochs at this time. That duty will be better performed by those more intimately acquainted with him. I only desired to express the high regard I entertained for Gen. Enochs as a member of this body, and to pay some tribute to his memory. He was cut off after serving a single term in Congress. But brief as his service was, Mr. Speaker, it was honorable to him and honorable to his constituents.

I can not close, however, without referring to the record of Gen. Enochs as a soldier during the late war. That he was a brave and gallant soldier, and served his country patriotically and faithfully there can be no doubt. At the very beginning of the war for the suppression of the rebellion, and before he had reached his majority, his young heart was stirred with patriotic ardor; and he enlisted as a private and entered the service of his country as a soldier; and he served in every rank from corporal to colonel, except that of major, and he was brevetted a brigadier-general. Of such a record any man might well be proud. To have risen from a private in the ranks in time of actual war to the office of a brevet brigadier-general is honor enough to enshrine his name and his memory in the hearts of his friends, his family, and his countrymen.

Mr. Speaker, it is to such men as Gen. W. H. Enochs that we are indebted for an undivided Union, for the preservation of the Government established by our fathers, and the prosperity which has followed the great struggle in which he rendered such distinguished, patriotic service. All honor to his memory!

[Mr. PAYNTER addressed the House. See Appendix.)

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, it has seldom fallen to the lot of any State to be deprived within a period of eighteen months of three of its Representatives in Congress by death.

That experience, however, little as it was contemplated two years ago, infrequent as has been its occurrence in the history of this body, and sadly suggestive as it must be to all of us, has been visited upon Ohio, and upon Pennsylvania also, since the beginning of the Fifty-second Congress.

Ohio's misfortune, in the loss of her three Representatives, began with the unexpected death of the well-beloved Warwick, after an illness so brief that many of his associates were not aware of its existence until after its fatal ending. Among all the surviving colleagues who mourned his departure from their midst, perhaps no two men could have been selected whose appearance more fully betokened the possession of perfect physical health and soundness than William H. Enochs and George W. Houk, both of whom had been rechosen by their fellow-citizens to fill the places in this Congress which they had so highly honored in the last; both of whom were all the more fully equipped for the efficient performance of public duty; both of whom have since been called away suddenly, without apparent warning, without even the grace of an intervening week of illness between the flush of health and the pallor of death.

I speak from external evidences only, for none of us may know the actual physical condition of even his closest friend nor the apprehensions and forebodings that may, and often do, rack his mind, absorb his thoughts, disturb his rest, and sit as a spectral presence at the fireside, and even at the feast.

It is to me a matter of much regret, Mr. Speaker, that I can say so little of what I feel ought to be said on this occasion, that my contribution to the tributes of well-merited praise which ought to and will be paid to the character and services of Gen. Enochs, must of necessity be so inadequate as to seem unworthy of the subject and the occasion.

Personally, I had never known him until we met here as colleagues in the Fifty-second Congress, nor was my acquaintance with him here of that intimate character that enables one to become familiar with the inner nature of his friend, and with the countless incidents that go to make up the personal history and largely to determine the personal character and qualities of every man. I only knew him as all might know him with whom he came in even casual contact, and my impressions of him were gained only from such sources as were alike open to all his associates.

He was a man of generous, kindly nature, of thoroughly patriotic purpose, strong in his convictions, and wholly without fear of the consequences to himself of any course of action he deemed it his duty to pursue. Hence the customary restraints of party discipline were often galling to him, the necessity of conforming his conduct to the views others and of following in the wake of party leadership irritated him keenly, and he could not always be controlled.

Many a time indeed during his brief service here was he known to vote and act with those to whom he was politically opposed, not in a factious or rebellious spirit, not upon any fundamental principle of party policy, for he was a partisan, but upon any and every question which did not involve an essential principle of political orthodoxy the vote of Gen. Enochs was cast according to his convictions of right and justice regardless of the action of his party associates. And for this manly spirit of independence, all too rare in this body, he was deserving of the commendation of his colleagues and of his countrymen. For the tendency here, Mr. Speaker, is all too great to make of almost every question of public interest and importance, or even of minor concern, a party question, and to vote upon it not always with reference to the individual views of members touching its intrinsic merits, but too often in accordance with the sentiment that may prevail on either side of the central aisle. It is a tendency that does not improve in all cases the quality of our legislation, that is sometimes fraught with mischief; a tendency that the example of such a man as Gen. Enochs would do much to rebuke and restrain.

Among those with whom he was brought into most frequent contact Gen. Enochs was, in the best sense of the word, a popular man. High-minded and chivalrous in his nature, wholly free from any form of affectation, without any of the instincts of the sycophant or the time-server, he was a man who loved his friends rather than his enemies, and was in turn beloved.

Of his professional career, his business and social life prior to his advent here, I am not prepared to speak except by inference. Neither am I familiar with the details of his service in the army; but this I know, the title he bore was not an empty compliment, bestowed through courtesy, as is too often the case. For he was one of the heroes of the war, whose courage was only equaled by his modesty, and modesty is almost invariably found to be the companion trait of true bravery. In the brief sketch of himself given in the Directory we are not even informed of the command in which he served, but simply that entering the service of his country as a private soldier he rose through all the intervening grades of rank to become a brigadier-general. And he was but 19 years of age when the war began.

It is a record, sir, of which any soldier might well be proud. If all its pages could be unfolded what a history would they disclose, what a claim would they establish upon the gratitude, the esteem, the admiration of his countrymen.

But he did not deem it essential to his reputation here that the volume in which this record is written should be unclosed, and I will not seek to penetrate its arcana nor even to break the seal put upon it by him.

It is not a light thing, Mr. Speaker, that a young man should for the sake of an idea, for the love of liberty, or even in the defense of his country quit his studies, his employments, and all the hallowed associations that cluster about the home of one's childhood to voluntarily place himself in the front of battle, where there could be no thought of personal safety and no assurance of escape from wounds or even from death.

You may call it by what name you will, the sentiment that can inspire the human heart to brave death, in any form, when the occasion is such as to demand or warrant the sacrifice, is a heroic, a noble, a praiseworthy sentiment; and whatever may be the estimate put by others upon such services as were rendered by our late associate in the dark days now happily, we trust, passed forever away, it will remain for his comrades to estimate them at their true value.

For, sir, whatever may have been said or written by the unthinking, by dreamers, by men whose only ideas of war have been gained from works of history, or of romance, none but those who have themselves experienced the horrors of actual war, who have themselves kept the lonely vigil of the midnight watch and marched beneath the burning heat of the noonday sun, who have seen the lives of their comrades go out in the hospital and in the prison as well as upon the battlefield, by the wasting fever as well as by the bullet and sword, who have themselves stood in the shock of battle and witnessed the carnage and heard the cries of the wounded and the groans of the dying, can form an adequate conception of the perils incurred and the sufferings endured by the gallant and brave men who, in our own day and in defense of a cause no less valuable and no less dear to their countrymen than to themselves, wrought a work as unselfish, as heroic, as any in the annals or traditions of the past.

We are their witnesses. It is for us to tell the story of their deeds to the generations that shall follow. It is for us upon every proper occasion to speak their praises, and to commemorate in every appropriate way the virtues and services of the men who bore an honorable part, however conspicuous or obscure, in the day of our country's greatest trial and of its supreme deliverance.

Gen. Enochs was but a typical though an illustrious representative of the class of men constituting that grand army that mustered from the city and the hamlet, from the counting-house and the workshop, from the office and the farm, in response to the call of the Government, then menaced with a most imminent and deadly danger, and not simply menaced but actually involved in a struggle for its existence the most gigantic, the most memorable in the history of civil wars.

And so, to-day, the garlands we bring would be unworthy of us, and disparaging to our late associate and comrade, if we should fail to weave into their structure, and blend with every tribute we pay to his memory some expression of our sense of his fidelity to the highest duty that could challenge the patriotism, the loyalty, the heroism, the supreme devotion of any lover of his country.

The response of our friend to that challenge was as prompt and obedient as it was uncalculating and sincere. And throughout the long and weary years of the war that spirit of devotion never faltered, nor did his courageous purpose for a moment waver, until the victory was won and the flag under which he fought floated again over all the land, the acknowledged ensign of a reunited people, having a common country, common interests, and a common destiny.

What more need be said of him? What higher tribute can be paid to the memory of any man than to say that he was true to every trust, loyal to every obligation, faithful in the performance of every duty, generous in every impulse, sincere in his friendships, the idol of his family, the defender of his country.

Our associate, our comrade, our friend, is no more. In the peaceful quietude of his own home, the hero of a score of battles met and surrendered to the destroying conqueror whose summons none may gainsay or resist.

He had lived to enjoy the reward of his services and sacrifices in the gratitude and love and confidence of his fellow-citizens. He died in the meridian of his manhood and in the fullness of his fame.

Let a grateful nation hold him in cherished remembrance, and may the example of his patriotism become and remain the pride and emulation of his countrymen.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Speaker, upon my election to the Fifty-second Congress, and especially after my assignment to committees, I took a great deal of care to become acquainted, as it were, in advance, with those who were to become my colleagues in the House and my coworkers in the work of the committees to which I was assigned. I can well remember, sir, the idea I had formed in my own mind concerning the gentleman whose memory is now being recalled in this House. I had learned from the brief notes that had found their way to me that, a mere boy, he had enlisted in the Union Army, and coming out at the end of the war not quite 23 years of age, had filled nearly every position in the line of preferment, from that of private, with which he started out to serve his country, to that of brigadier-general, the brevet of which he wore when he left the service.

I also found, sir, that he had come from one of the most partisan—if I may use that term without incurring criticism—sections of the country; where, if one might judge from the majority by which his constituents sent him here to represent them in this House, the tendency of his party was such as to indicate extraordinary partisanship on the part of his people. I knew, sir, that the committee upon which I met him was one within which, probably to an extent not rivaled by that of any other committee, were considered matters which called up the most delicate questions of personal preference and all the warring claims of party and of locality; and I was prepared, sir, to be critical as regarded what seems to me must be the course which should be taken by such a man as I had pictured him to myself—not in an uncomplimentary matter—but as one judging from the prejudices and predilections necessarily opposed to those entertained by those with whom I was associated, and which would influence me in deciding a course of action.

Throughout the long term of service in that committee I found the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Enochs] disappointed me in every particular, except in confirming the high qualities, their esteem of which had been so strongly voiced by his constituency. From the beginning to the end of a service which was marked upon his part by unvarying punctuality in attendance on our committee work there was not, I believe I can say, a single occasion in which it could have been inferred, from a vote he cast or any statement he made—except so far as he might have been called upon for information by those of his colleagues who desired it—what was the section from which he came, the party to which he belonged, or the interest in he which might be supposed to have most at stake. And, sir, it is the remembrance of that fact, and of that quiet industry with which he discharged the work that came upon him—the laborious and thankless work, I may say, of that committee in the last Congress—that I am here to-day to pay a tribute to his memory.

In doing so, sir, I am paying tribute to the memory of a soldier who, distinguished in war beyond his fellows, never by word or deed fought a post bellum battle; to the memory of a partisan strong in his belief in the mission of his party, so strong in his conviction of the justice of its cause that he believed the best way to serve it was to serve the best interest of our common country, without waiting to see how it affected his party; to the memory of a gentleman who, although possessing to such an extent the confidence of those who knew him that he had every reason to return that regard by deference to their personal predilections, was broad enough and generous enough to treat every other locality with the same consideration that he gave his own; to the memory of a patriot, sir, whose belief in the destiny of his own country was so sanguine that, even as to those who differed with him, his attitude was so tinged by his own generous spirit that he gave to every colleague credit for the same patriotic sentiments that animated himself.

[Mr. McKAIG addressed the House. See Appendix.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with pleasure and profit to the well-deserved tributes which have been paid to the memory of Gen. Enochs here to-day.

It was my fortune to have some acquaintance with the distinguished gentleman, whose death we to-day commemorate. I did not know him intimately, but frequently met him in conventions of the political party of which he and I were members. In common with those who met him in any of the walks of life, I learned to esteem Gen. William H. Enochs for his excellent capabilities, genial fellowship, and his splendid military achievements.

Gen. Enochs was warm-hearted and generous to a fault. He could not resist the appeals of those who were disposed to disregard his friendship by imposing upon his magnanimity. But while this characteristic trait of his constitution was often prejudicial to his interests and individual success in business affairs, it contributed to his great popularity among the people with whom he lived. The generous-hearted man is always lovable because of his disinterested solicitude for the welfare of the humble people.

As one of the Congressional committee who attended the funeral of Gen. Enochs, I met a very large congregation of sympathizing friends and neighbors, who reverently witnessed the last sad rites. There were present also many distinguished gentlemen from abroad. The attendant scenes were impressive, one affecting feature being the presence of many humble men and women, who timidly entered the room where the remains were resting, and, as the unbidden tears moistened their cheeks, lingering looked, and then turned away from all that was mortal of the man who had been their friend.

I am informed that our lamented colleague died a poor man. But is it not worthy of reflection that this consideration is small compared to the fact that his memory is enshrined in the hearts of a grateful people. There are more than enough men who have died rich in the possession of this world's goods, but who left behind them no treasures in the memories of those who survived them. The wealthy may have erected to their memories magnificent monuments of marble or granite to mark the resting places of their ashes; but a far more enduring and honorable tribute of respect to the memory of a man is the abiding love and respect which those who knew him best retain for him after his death.

William H. Enochs was born on a farm March 24, 1842, and was there brought up. He was educated in the common schools, entered the Cincinnati Law School, graduated in 1866, and then practiced law. He was always courteous in his intercourse with other members of the bar and in the presence of the court.

But to my mind the most distinguished part of his eventful life was his services for the preservation of the Union. He enlisted in the Twenty-second Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry on the 19th day of April, A. D. 1861; and he afterwards enlisted in the Fifth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and became its commanding officer and led his regiment in many severe engagements.

On account of his bravery he was promoted corporal, sergeant, lieutenant, captain, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brevet brigadier-general successively. This is a record of which any man should be justly proud. As much as I esteem civil honors, I regard the military services of Gen. Enochs in the war of the rebellion as especially honorable. The man who in a righteous cause risks his life and sacrifices his private interests for the public welfare, is entitled to greater credit than he who in civil affairs distinguishes himself above his fellow-men.

Gen. Enochs was a member of the Fifty-second Congress and served in that body with distinction and ability. His constituency, proud of his record, returned him to the Fifty-third Congress; but he died before entering upon the discharge of his duties. He was patriotic to an eminent degree, and always used his best endeavors to advance the interests of those whom he represented, and especially those who served with him in the armies of his country. If Gen. Enochs had faults—and who has not?—they were those of an over-generous heart and were not of the kind that inflicted injuries upon others. He was a good citizen, a brave soldier, an able lawyer, a loving husband and father, a true friend—a gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that I am not prepared to make more fitting if not more extended remarks on this occasion. And I sincerely hope that my esteem for Gen. Enochs personally and my regard for his civil and military services will not be measured by the few words which I speak to-day. I am not sure that with preparation and care it would be possible for me to effectually express my appreciation of my distinguished fellow-citizen and fellow-soldier. His name is honored and respected among his neighbors, and his record as a statesman and soldier is found in the archives of his country, where future generations may trace his honorable and eventful civil and military career.

It is not expected that my remarks shall transcend a brief mention of the salient features of a busy and useful life. Yet, when confronted with the subject of life and death, our minds naturally reflect upon the possibilities of a future life. It is at such times that we most realize our inability to fully comprehend the attributes of the soul.

Life is marvelous beyond description, and death is not more mysterious than birth. The human intellect is incapable of understanding the principle of life, and can not penetrate beyond the veil which separates life and death. The tongue is powerless to express our imaginations or portray our feeble conceptions concerning the final destiny of man.

It is only by faith we see the glimmering lights of an eternity. What ecstatic beauties usher the spirit into the realms of futurity are known only to those who have passed beyond the scenes of earth.

But our faith in the divinity of our Creator springs from our hope of an eternity. The wisdom of God surpasses our understanding, and I believe we may rest assured of His goodness and mercy in all of His dealings with the subjects of this creation. Acknowledging His supremacy, trusting in His promises, and recognizing His infinite solicitude for the welfare of the human race, may we not freely commit into the keeping of our Creator the final destiny of every individual soul?

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, it is my desire and purpose to pay a modest tribute to the memory of our deceased colleague and friend Gen. Enochs, but I am not quite prepared at this moment, and I therefore ask consent to print my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Speaker, in the presence of death we should always speak words of soberness and truth. Unmerited eulogy should never be indulged in, nor should we withhold a single word of just commendation. We may not always speak all the truth of a dead person, but what we do say should always be the truth. Our portraiture of a person should be so lifelike that acquaintances of that person can recognize in our language a correct likeness of the life and peculiarities of the one spoken of.

Such language may not always be used with pleasure, for its correctness may cause pain, not alone in the speaker but in the hearer or reader as well.

But when we have a subject of whom truthful words can be spoken without pain to the speaker or the listener, then what might otherwise be a burden is relieved of all unpleasantness and we cheerfully perform a sad duty in speaking of the merits of a dead friend.

In speaking of a public man we may confine our words to his public life as he lived it and leave untouched his private life, or we may venture to comment upon both. This oftentimes relieves a speaker of much embarrassment, for the public life may have been such as to merit commendation, while the private life may have been such that truthful words had better not be spoken publicly of it.

But when the private life has been along the line of high, noble, and manly action, has aided humanity and relieved pain and want, has strengthened the moral forces in society, has tended to build up and protect homes and families, has aided in the education and elevation of the masses, has been an example for the young, ambitious, and struggling men and women, has added to the imperishable glory of a nation, and taught the world by examples of heroic daring that sacrifice of one's self in defense of one's country places that one in the list of immortals; and when to this is added a public life which fully supplements the private life, and seeks to carry out in public acts those things which speak for public good, then we may with lively feelings of satisfaction make fitting mention of the whole life and hold it up in language of truthful eulogy as a life to be commended and followed as an example.

Some men have lived more conspicuous lives than Gen. Enochs, but few have lived truer or better ones. Many have had more extended public lives; none have lived those lives more conscientiously than he. Many whose private lives were known by a larger circle of men and women; few whose lives were purer or blessed more within its influence.

I had not the pleasure of an acquaintance with our dead friend, and it is for me to regret the want of that acquaintance.

Few men have devoted themselves more unselfishly to public or private good. Few men have exhibited greater devotion to their country or taught to better advantage the example of heroic daring.

Entering the Army as he did, a young man, and passing through all grades from private to brigadier-general by brevet, he exhibited a devotion to patriotism and country which must make his name immortal among the heroes of a country which blesses and immortalizes its brave defenders. When the war was over no feeling of hate or resentment found lodgment in his bosom. From over the fields of Vicksburg, Chickamauga, Gettysburg, and Appomattox there came to him no breezes freighted with malice or hate, but he was filled with forgiveness for all who made those fields possible, and love undying for all those brothers in arms who made those fields glorious.

He was a soldier who fought bravely and well to conquer—and then he forgave and treated all as brothers and not as conquered.

He had a broad-gauged mind and he looked at things on the human side and judged all in the spirit of kindness and humanity.

His service in Congress was of such short duration, being but one term, that little opportunity was afforded him to do those things which would bring him into prominence. None know so well as those who have tried the experiment how helpless one is to be of much service to his constituents or the country in Congress until, by experience, he has learned how work is done and under what rules. So it came about that Gen. Enochs followed the course pursued by so many others, and made but little public show. Yet those of you who served with him know how conscientiously he performed those duties which fell to his lot to perform.

But his history as a soldier, citizen, and public man is a sure guaranty that had he lived to continue his career in Congress he would have made a brilliant record, and become the pride of his constituents and his State. But death respects not ambition or prospective greatness in life. His icy touch chills into everlasting stillness the brave, the gentle, the young, and brilliant, as well as the weak and dull. He respects not bright hopes, and is not stayed by breaking hearts, but enters all the walks of life, and leaves his pall upon all homes, and—

> With ever busy fingers
> Culls his flowers, the sweetest, rarest,
> Binding in his sheaves the fairest.

But his touch is not the end. Those who are worthy will live in the memories of those who have been blessed by them, and in the remembrance of noble acts well done. Gen. Enochs when a very young man exhibited qualities of manhood and bravery which enshrined him in the hearts of his neighbors and friends, and made his career memorable.

He listened to the call of his countrymen, and well did he perform his duty.

And in his life he learned as well as taught that—

> Not once, nor twice, in our fair country's story,
> Was the path of duty the way to glory;
> And he who walks it, thirsting only for the right,
> And learns to deaden love of self—
> Before his journey closes, he shall find
> The stubborn thistle bursting into glossy purples,
> Which outredden all voluptuous garden roses.

Death may cut short human action, but it can not chill forever the memory of noble acts. So beyond the boundary of human activity buds and blooms loving remembrance, bidding defiance to death.

Our dead friend lives in all that is deathless; only his form is gone. His devotion to home and country, his bravery and gentleness, his life, "four square to every wind that blew," his kindness to friends and neighbors, his activity for public good, his humanity bear him up to everlasting remembrance, and have earned for him among his neighbors and acquaintances that glorious commendation which we trust greeted him on the other shore—"Well done."

Mr. BUNDY. Mr. Speaker, to my colleague, Gen. GROSVENOR, was committed the charge of conducting the order of the proceedings in calling the attention of the House to the death of the late Gen. Enochs.

This is in accordance with the wishes of his family and friends, as I am advised, but I desire the privilege of casting a sprig of cassia into his grave and of placing a flower on his tomb.

Gen. William H. Enochs was my immediate predecessor, having been elected in November, 1892, from the Tenth Ohio Congressional district. From the Directory of the Fifty-second Congress I glean a short and incomplete sketch of his life.

From this I learn that he was born in Ohio on the 29th day of March, A. D. 1842. He was brought up on a farm, and was educated in the common schools peculiar to those earlier days; he entered the Union Army as a private early in the war; served throughout the war as private, sergeant, captain, lieutenant-colonel, colonel, and brigadier-general. He commenced the study of law in camp, and at the close of the war entered the Cincinnati Law School, from which he graduated, and was then admitted to the bar. He at once actively engaged in the practice of his profession, which he followed until his death.

At the annual election of 1890 Gen. Enochs was elected to the Fifty-second Congress from the Twelfth Ohio district by a very large majority, leading the State ticket, and in 1892 he was elected to the Fifty-third Congress from the Tenth Ohio district, which is composed in part of the former Twelfth district.

On the morning of the 13th of last July our district and State were severely shocked. The startling news went over the wires of the sudden death, at his home in Ironton, of Congressman Enochs. The news seemed incredible; and at first the people were unwilling to accept it as true. Conspicuously powerful in appearance, and in all his methods of work and action he seemed certain to survive all assaults save those of the ultimate years of man's allotted time. He had scarcely reached the meridian of his power, had just attained that point of a career whose future was destined to become one of usefulness and distinguished honor, when summoned from Time to Eternity.

Gen. Enochs was one of the noted characters that stand out in history, showing the possibilities of the young man who, unaided by wealth or fortuitous circumstances, and by the force of his own will power, honesty, industry, and perseverance can achieve and win distinction among his fellows such as the world awards to the so-called majesty of genius.

Born on a farm, inspired by the objects of nature, it might be said that Gen. Enochs received the rudiments of his education in the school of practical experience, which so eminently fits a young man for the battle of life.

Plain and unpretentious of manner, with a nature abounding in human sympathies, a lover of his country and of his kind, he was essentially a man of the people, a great commoner who was ever ready to give a helping hand to his fellows. He was a man of pronounced convictions on all questions and was as fearless in their utterance as he was sincere in their entertainment.

He was unfaltering in his loyalty to Republican principles, and even his political enemies were frank to admit their admiration for his open and conscientious convictions.

He stood squarely upon his merits as a man in all the relations of life, never shirked a duty nor sought to evade responsibility. His life was one of self-sacrifice in behalf of others, and he died as he had lived, an enemy to none, a friend to all mankind.

Gen. Enochs was a citizen loved by his neighbors, honored and respected by all; he was a philanthropist with a generous hand, and no unfortunate, however poor, ever left his door without having been comforted by his generosity. He was a soldier by instinct, a stranger to fear, a gallant leader whom men were always proud to follow, and whose time and talent in later years were devoted to the cause of his comrades; history shows that he was distinguished in all the lines of service in the Army—in fact, that he was one of the youngest, if not the youngest, commandants of a brigade in the volunteer service. He was a lawyer true to his profession, and exhibited an unfaltering zeal for the success of his clients. He was a statesman of the practical type, with exalted ideas of the obligations which public trust imposes. He was a patriot who loved his country with a jealous love, and was willing, if need be, to lay down his own life in defense of the old flag and the principles which it represents.

Gen. Enochs possessed, in a marked degree, all the elements which serve to attract men to each other. His popularity and ability are plainly demonstrated by his rapid promotion in the Army, his success as a lawyer, and his election to Congress.

But he has been suddenly called from his field of activity and usefulness here to take up the line of march of the silent majority, including a large number of his old comrades in the field, to the goal where we hope and believe there is no war, but where all is peace and joy eternal.

But, Mr. Speaker, our resolutions and eulogies fall silent upon the ear of our dead colleague.

> The good knight is dust,
> His good sword is rust,
> His soul is with the saints, we trust.

Mr. Speaker, the sudden taking off of Gen. Enochs left the companion of his joys and the sharer of his trials and sorrows, together with an only son—a bright young man, and his father, earnestly desiring that he should have that education and preparation necessary for intelligent and effective services to his country, nominated him to a cadetship to the Military Academy at West Point, and who, it is believed, will worthily represent the best interests of the country in the future as his brave father did in the past.

Mr. Speaker, when I retired from Congress in March, 1875, five of my colleagues had fallen during the last or short session of that, the Forty-third, Congress. As I return now, five of those who were members of this Congress have passed to the other shore.

Surely, Mr. Speaker, this ought to admonish us that we are fast approaching the assembling of that great and final congress of all nations, kindred, and tongues, whose sessions and terms are eternal, and whose business can not be interrupted by broken quorums. Is it not the supreme duty of the hour that the living should take all the precaution possible to assure the regularity of the elections, returns, and the official signing and sealing of commissions, so as to secure an unchallenged right to seats in that greatest of all congresses, where we shall be fully prepared to answer "yea" to that most significant and important question propounded by "the man of Uz," in the long ago—

> If a man die, shall he live again?

The resolutions were adopted; and the House accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) adjourned.

He also (for Mr. MCPHERSON) introduced a bill (S. 1782) to amend the Articles for the Government of the Navy relative to punishment on conviction by court-martial; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also (for Mr. MCPHERSON) introduced a bill (S. 1783) to provide for naturalization by enlistment and service in the United States Navy and Marine Corps; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CHANDLER introduced a bill (S. 1785) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Charles T. Hurd, formerly a landsman in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1786) for the relief of Charles E. Behle; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PEFFER. I desire to introduce two bills, both of them by request. They come from what is designated by an indorsement as the "Good Roads Association of the United States." I know nothing about this association. I am personally acquainted with the gentleman who claims to represent the association—a man of good character. The bills are respectful in form. I merely wish to say that I am not in sympathy with the object of the bills, and therefore I wish to have it distinctly understood that I am in nowise responsible for the matter contained in them. Still, while that is true, I look upon this class of cases a good deal like I do upon a petition, and that it is not any of my business what is the object of a petition or what is the object of a bill if it is courteous and respectful and comes from people who are worthy of respect. I ask that the bills be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, as follows:

A bill (S. 1787) to provide for public improvements and employment of the citizens of the United States; and

A bill (S. 1788) to provide for the improvement of public roads, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANDERSON introduced a bill (S. 1789) to provide for the resurvey of Grant and Hooker Counties, Nebr.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1790) to reimburse the city of Nebraska City, Nebr., for money expended in street paving at the north end of the Government building in that city; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. PERKINS (for Mr. WHITE) introduced a bill (S. 1791) for the relief of James Joyes, late first lieutenant United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 1792) granting a pension to Joseph M. Pilkington; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. In support of the bill I present the petition of Joseph M. Pilkington, and the affidavits of W. J. Satterwhite and Drs. John W. Trader and W. H. Evans. I move that the bill be referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERICAL FORCE IN TREASURY AND INTERIOR DEPARTMENTS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, submitted by Mr. GALLINGER on the 15th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate, in separate lists, the names of all clerks appointed, promoted, reduced, and dismissed since the 4th day of March, 1893, and the State to which each clerk is credited.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I desire to make a little further investigation in the line of the resolution, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is withdrawn.

POLICY REGARDING HAWAII.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning, as soon as I can get the floor conveniently, I shall call up the resolution in reference to Hawaii, reported by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] from the Committee on Foreign Relations, with a view of making some remarks on the legal aspects of the case.

TRANSMISSION OF PERIODICALS, ETC., IN SACKS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER on the 15th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads be, and it is hereby, instructed to consider and report whether the postal laws and regulations ought not to be so amended that any person shall have the right to mail any periodical, track, leaflet, or other similar publication, by the sack or otherwise, and have the same delivered to any receiver of mail at any domestic post-office when the postage is prepaid thereon at the rate of 1 cent per pound or fractional part thereof, and when such publications are not of obscene or immoral character, not issued for advertising purposes, nor to incite riot or insurrection.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, this resolution is one that needs to be explained before it is acted upon by the Senate, and I shall occupy a very few minutes in explaining its object.

In the first place, under the rules and regulations of the Post-Office Department, mailable matter is divided into classes. There is one general class known as second-class matter, and it has two subdivisions. I read section 276 of the Postal Laws and Regulations of 1893:

Mailable matter of the second class shall embrace all newspapers and other periodical publications which are issued at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, and are within the conditions named in sections 12 and 14. (Act of March 3, 1879, sec. 10; 20 Stats., 359.) The sections referred to are 293 and 277. Second-class matter above described is of two kinds: (1) That sent by publishers or news agents. (2) That sent by others than publishers or news agents. (Section 302.)

Something more than a year ago, perhaps a year and a half ago—at any rate under the last Administration—my attention was called to the rejection by the Post-Office Department of an application made by the secretary of the Kansas State Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union. The application was made for permission to have a certain publication of the order to which he belonged passed through the mails as second-class matter under the section which I have just read. Upon examination of a copy of the publication the Postmaster-General was of opinion that it was not such a publication as is included within the purview of the statute and the regulations.

Upon further examination, however, and upon representation by myself, the Department reëxamined the publication, and found that it was not an advertising sheet in any sense; that it did not come under any of the heads relating to objectionable matter; that it was merely a publication of the order, issued once a month, for the purpose of conveying the news as to the progress of the order, the changes made in their rules and regulations, and the general drift and tendency of the work of the order. Later, under the same Administration, another application was made by a gentleman in the city of St. Louis, one Mr. Morgan, as I remember. He proposed to issue a regular weekly newspaper, and was anxious to advertise the paper and the enterprise largely with the first edition. He wished to send through the mails an edition of a hundred thousand copies of the first issue of the paper.

His application was rejected, on the ground that the legitimate subscription list of the publisher was too small to justify so large a circulation for the first issue, or for any other issue in excess of the bona fide mailing list. Upon further examination, and also upon my own presentation of the case, the Postmaster-General modified his order to the extent that papers to the number of about five times the number of bona fide subscribers upon the publisher's list might be sent through the mails at the first issue, and a certain number in advance from that time on so as to correspond as nearly as might be with the practice as to other regular publications.

Mr. President, I have another case which is different from either of the former cases, in which, in the ruling, the Postmaster-General, upon a second application, not one personal from myself, however, remains of the belief that his former ruling was correct. The gentleman affected has appealed to me for assistance, and I have thought it best to render it by offering the pending resolution. He is a resident of this city, a citizen of the State of Virginia, I believe, and he is an active advocate of views which he and a few others like him hold upon economic questions.

He has found it convenient in several instances to announce himself as a candidate for prominent offices in the State of Virginia, member of Congress, governor, and the like, with a view of disseminating his ideas. By way of aiding his ambition in this respect he proposed to publish a little periodical, a quarterly, called the Virginia Pantocrat.

The gentleman claims to be the founder of a new party called the Pantocrat party, and the members speak of themselves as Pantocrats. His publication is altogether respectable, altogether decent; but it was clear to my mind upon the presentation of the first issue of his little paper that it was not properly mailable as second-class matter. I so advised him, and the reason I gave was that it was advertising the man rather than the doctrine, at least it was advertising both; and upon appeal to the Postmaster-General he received a similar answer. But now he comes out with a second number of his paper, from which he has eliminated the advertising feature; that is to say, that which advertised himself upon the ticket of any party, and he simply presents the doctrines, the same as a Republican writer or a Democratic writer or a Populist or a Prohibitionist or a Nationalist writer would do. He claims the privilege of passing through the mails as second-class matter this little paper.

The resolution asks that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads shall consider and report not any specific matter, but whether the postal laws and regulations ought not to be so amended that any person shall have the right to mail any periodical, tract, leaflet, or other similar publication, by the sack or otherwise, and have the same delivered to any receiver of mail at any domestic post-office when the postage is prepaid thereon at the rate of 1 cent per pound or fractional part thereof, and when such publications are not of obscene or immoral character, not issued for advertising purposes, nor to incite riot or insurrection.

While I am not in harmony with this paper at all, any more than I am with a Republican or a Democratic paper, a question is presented by this man and it is that question that I now present to the Senate for action by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, whether the postal laws and regulations may not be or ought not to be so amended that any person, whether he be a publisher or not, whether he is a private citizen or who he may be, may not properly pass through the mails as second-class matter such periodicals as are mentioned in the law and the regulations now. For example, a friend of mine in the city of New York may forward to me a thousand or ten thousand tracts with the request that I distribute them. They may be temperance tracts, they may be religious tracts, they may be political tracts, they may be reform tracts, they may be tariff tracts, or what not. The resolution would permit my friend in New York to send those tracts to me as second-class matter, and it would permit me to mail and distribute them in packages or single at pound rates, a cent a pound for every pound or fraction of a pound.

So, too, it would permit me to distribute my newspapers after I have read them; and that is a very common practice with a great many people. After they have read their newspaper or their magazine or their tract they are anxious to send it to some friend in order that he or she may have the same benefit or pleasure from perusing it that they did; and if the law were amended as the resolution suggests it would permit persons to send periodicals of those classes through the mail the same as a publisher does. While I do not see any reason why it should not be done, I see a good many reasons why it should be done, and I therefore now appeal to the Senate and ask that the resolution may be adopted and that the committee may consider carefully whether the time has not come when any individual person, man, woman, or child, may send through the mail at pound rates just such matters as the newspaper publishers and printers are permitted to send through the mail. That is all there is in the resolution, and I ask that it may be adopted.

Mr. PLATT. I wish to have the resolution read once more.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. PLATT. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution. I do not believe in its adoption, but I have no objection to its being considered by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PEFFER. I move that the papers in my possession be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads in connection with the resolution. I will send them to the desk.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 856) granting an increase of pension to John Stockwell was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 5065) to ratify the reservation of certain lands made for the benefit of Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 6073) to extend the limits of the port of New York was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. 6250) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to loan the Columbian caravels to the American National Red Cross, incorporated, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BRIG. GEN. JOHN R. BROOKE.

The bill (H. R. 2640) for the relief of Brig. Gen. John R. Brooke, United States Army, was read twice by its title.

Mr. MANDERSON. A bill identical with this measure passed the Senate about a week ago. The only change there is in the House bill is one that decidedly betters it, and requires that within three months from the passage of the act this offer of compromise shall be accepted by the judgment creditors. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the bill be read at length, so that there may be no question about the two bills being identical.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of Andrew Cameron, of New Mexico, the sum of $1,000, and to the legal representatives of John Smith, of New Mexico, the sum of $1,000, being in full satisfaction of the judgments obtained by the said Cameron and Smith in the district court of the first judicial district of the Territory of New Mexico, at the August term of 1809, against Lieut. Col. John R. Brooke, Third Infantry, United States Army, now brigadier-general United States Army, for alleged trespass and false imprisonment: Provided, That the provisions of this bill shall be accepted by the legal representatives of Andrew Cameron and John Smith as a settlement in full of all claims against John R. Brooke, of the United States Army, within three months from the passage hereof. And the said sums are hereby appropriated for said purposes, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid and received in full discharge and satisfaction of all claims arising out of said judgments.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DEATH OF THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE ENOCHS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the resolutions of the House of Representatives in reference to the death of my late colleague in that body be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The resolutions were read, as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with sincere regret the announcement of the death of Hon. William H. Enochs, late a Representative from the State of Ohio.

Resolved, That the business of the House be suspended in order that the public services and private character of the deceased be thoroughly commemorated.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed to communicate these resolutions to the Senate, and send a duly attested copy to the widow of the deceased.

Resolved, That at the conclusion of these services the House, as a further mark of respect, do adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the resolutions lie on the table for the present. At some convenient period I shall call the attention of the Senate to the matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions will lie on the table.

PROPOSED EXECUTIVE SESSION FOR TUESDAY.

Mr. CALL. I desire to give notice that I shall not move for an executive session to day, but will do so to-morrow. I make this announcement at the request of Senators who have some special bills they wish to have acted upon by the Senate to-day.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1749) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River at Glenwood, Pa., which was reported this morning from the Committee on Commerce, with amendments. It is a bill to which there is no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments of the Committee on Commerce will be stated in their order.

The first amendment was on page 2, to strike out section 2 in the following words:

SEC. 2. That any act of Congress, or part of an act inconsistent herewith, so far as it affects the same, is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3 [2], line 23, after the word "feet" to insert the words "in length in the clear;" after the word "and," in the same line to insert "the;" and to strike out in line 24 the words, "fifty-three feet above low-water mark," and insert "the superstructure shall not be less than 53 feet above the level of the water at pool full in said river;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That the channel span of said bridge shall be not less than 500 feet in length in the clear, and the clear height of the superstructure shall not be less than 53 feet above the level of the water at pool full in said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 5 (4), line 4, after the word "date," to strike out the word "hereof" and insert "of the approving this act;" so as to read:

That this act shall be null and void if actual construction of the bridge herein authorized be not commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of the approving this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration at this time of the bill (S. 755) granting the right of way to the Albany and Astoria Railroad Company through the Grand Ronde Indian Reservation in the State of Oregon, which was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART].

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments: in section 1, line 3, before the word "hundred," to strike out "two" and insert "one;" and in line 4, after the word "width," to insert "and such additional width as may be required at any point on account of the formation of the ground for necessary cuts and fills;" so as to make the section read:

That a right of way not exceeding 100 feet in width and such additional width as may be required at any point on account of the formation of the ground for necessary cuts and fills through the Grand Ronde Indian Reservation, in the State of Oregon, shall be, and is hereby, granted to the Albany and Astoria Railroad Company, a corporation duly organized under the laws of the State of Oregon, or its assigns, according to the plans and surveys of the route to be filed in the Department and approved by the Secretary of the Interior; and said company shall also have the right to take from said lands adjacent to the line of said railroad, material, stone, earth, and timber necessary for the construction of said railroad; also ground adjacent to such right of way for station buildings, depots, machine shops, side tracks, turn-outs, and water stations, not to exceed in amount 200 feet in width and 3,000 feet in length for each station, to the extent of one station for each 10 miles of road.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONSOLIDATION OF GEORGETOWN WITH WASHINGTON, D. C.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 445, which was objected to some time since by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. He has examined the bill and states that he has no further objection to it. It is very important that the bill shall be passed at an early date.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 445) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," approved February 21, 1871, and also an act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPERTY RETURNS BY GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 5530) to regulate the making of property returns by officers of the Government be now considered. It was passed over heretofore on the objection of the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL], who now withdraws his objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that instead of forwarding to accounting officers of the Treasury Department returns of public property intrusted to the possession of officers or agents, the Quartermaster-General, the Commissary-General of Subsistence, the Surgeon-General, the Chief of Engineers, the Chief of Ordnance, the Chief Signal Officer, the Paymaster-General of the Navy, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or other like chief officers in any department, by, through, or under whom stores, supplies, and other public property are received for distribution, or whose duty it is to receive or examine returns of such property, shall certify to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury Department, for debiting on the proper account, any charge against any officer or agent intrusted with public property, arising from any loss accruing by his fault, to the Government as to the property so intrusted to him.

The certificate shall set forth the condition of such officer's or agent's property returns, that it includes all charges made up to its date and not previously certified, that he has had a reasonable opportunity to be heard and has not been relieved of responsibility; the effect of such certificate, when received, shall be the same as if the facts therein set forth had been ascertained by the accounting officers of the Treasury Department in accounting.

The manner of making property returns to or in any administrative bureau or department, or of ascertaining liability for property, under existing laws and regulations, shall not be affected by this act, except as provided in section 1; but in all cases arising as to such property so intrusted the officer or agent shall have an opportunity to relieve himself from liability.

The heads of the several Departments are empowered to make and enforce regulations to carry out the provisions of this act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACCOUNTS OF TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5529) to repeal section 311 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to accounts of the Treasury of the United States. It is one of the bills reported from the Committee on Organization, Conduct, and Expenditures of the Executive Departments.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

Mr. TELLER. I intended this morning to call up Senate bill 341, known as the McGarrahan bill; but there are some Senators who desire to have me postpone its consideration until Thursday. I now ask unanimous consent that that bill may be made the unfinished business for 2 o'clock on Thursday, which, I believe, meets the approval of those who are opposed to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent that Senate bill 341, known as the McGarrahan bill, may be assigned for consideration for Thursday at 2 o'clock as the unfinished business. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the assignment is made.

FORMS OF DEEDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 832) to simplify the form of deeds of conveyance, trust, and releases of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, line 12, after the word "shall," to insert "unless exception be made therein;" so as to make the section read:

That from and after the passage of this act any instrument of writing hereafter signed, acknowledged, and recorded in said District, and in the following form or to the like effect, namely:

"This deed, made this ——— day of ———, A. D. ———, between [the grantor] and [the grantee], witnesseth: That in consideration of [here state the consideration] the said [the grantor] conveys unto the said [the grantee] the following property, situate in the District of Columbia [here describe the property]. With as the following signature," shall, unless exception be made therein, be deemed and held sufficient in law and in equity to vest in the grantee or grantees therein named his, her, or their heirs or assigns, all the interest and estate, legal and equitable, of the grantor or grantors therein named and signing the same, in and to the land therein described, with all the improvements thereon and all easements, hereditaments, appurtenances, and rights thereunto belonging.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, line 2, before the word "shall," strike out "and warrants" (or "warrant"), and insert "general warranty;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That if in any instrument as aforesaid the words "general warranty" shall be used after the word "conveys" (or "convey") the grantor or grantors shall be deemed and held to covenant for himself, herself, or themselves, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, to forever warrant and defend the title to the premises conveyed unto the grantee or grantees, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, for and against the lawful claims of all persons whomsoever.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after section 2, to insert a new section as follows:

SEC. 3. That if, in any instrument as aforesaid, the words "and warrant specially" shall be used after the word "convey" or "conveys," the grantor or grantors shall be deemed and held to covenant for himself, herself, or themselves, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, to forever warrant and defend the title to the premises conveyed unto the grantee or grantees, his, her, or their heirs, personal representatives, and assigns, against the claims and demands of the grantor or grantors and of persons claiming or to claim by, through, or under him, her, or them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, line 18, after the word "survivors" to strike out "a fee simple estate" and insert "all the estate, right, title, and interest whatever, both at law and in equity, of the grantor;" and in line 29, after the word "demanded," to insert "when requested in writing by the beneficiary or his assigns under said deed;" so as to read:

Witness, the following signature (or signatures) and seal (or seals) shall be deemed legally sufficient in form to vest in the trustee (or trustees, the survivor or survivors), all the estate, right, title, and interest whatever, both at law and in equity, of the grantor in the land conveyed for the purposes of the trust, and, unless otherwise in the deed expressed, to the payment of the debt or interest or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the note, notes, bond or bonds described, or any extensions or renewal thereof, or of any sum or sums advanced by the party or parties secured on account of taxes or insurance when demanded when requested in writing by the beneficiary or his assigns under said deed, to sell the land described, or such thereof as may be necessary, at public auction, in front of the premises, at such time, upon such terms, with such postponement or postponements of sale or resale.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section 3 (4), line 38, after the word "convey," to strike out "in fee simple" and insert "all the right, title, and interest held by the trustee;" and in line 40, after the word "purchasers" to strike out "at his, her, or their cost;" so as to read:

On compliance with the terms of sale to convey all the right, title, and interest held by the trustee to the purchaser or purchasers the property sold, discharged of the trusts and of all liability on the part of the purchaser or purchasers to see to or account for the application of the purchase money, and to apply the proceeds of the sale after retaining a trustee's commission on the gross amount thereof not exceeding 2 per centum thereof, as follows:

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill that this is a very simple conveyance in trust without any indication upon the face of it that there is any power in the trustee to sell and dispose of the property by an advertisement on ten days' notice, while at the same time the law authorizes other kinds of deeds of trust where the terms of the sale and the advertisement and all can be specified. Now, there will probably be two forms of deeds of trust in the District. One will be the form where it will be specified upon certain conditions that if the money is not paid or something of the kind, then the trustee will do so and so. That will be a perfectly valid deed. That is the kind that has usually been made here in the District. But now here is one that says nothing about a sale, and it would in the estimation of most persons coming from other States, I know particularly from my own State, be held to be simply a mortgage in fact and would have to be foreclosed in court. Here under the terms of the bill the power of sale is given by law and not by the instrument, and I suggest that there ought to be in the face of this conveyance just one or two words to express that the power of sale is authorized by law. Therefore, in section 4, line 15, after the words "to the tenor and effect of [here insert the number and description of the note or notes or bond or bonds, and so forth]" I move to strike out the period and insert a comma, and insert the words "with the power of sale authorized by law."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Missouri will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Insert after the words "[and so forth]," in line 15, section 3 (4), the words "with the power of sale authorized by law," so as to read:

In trust to secure to [the party secured] payment of the sum of [amount] dollars, on account of [here state character of debt], and interest thereon, the said debt and interest being payable according to the tenor and effect of [here insert the number and description of the note or notes, bond or bonds, etc.], with the power of sale authorized by law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to insert in line 34, section 4, before the word "newspaper," the word "daily," so as to read:

And after such previous advertisement, not less than ten days, in a daily newspaper or newspapers printed and published in said District.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was to strike out section 5 (6), in the following words:

SEC. 6. That any covenant in any deed hereafter made of land in the District of Columbia, in the following words, or to the like effect, namely:

"And the said [here insert the name of the covenantor or covenantors] covenants (or covenant) to forever warrant the title to the said land and premises against all persons whomsoever claiming the same, or any part thereof, by, from, through, or under the said [here insert name of covenantor or covenantors], his, her, or their heirs and assigns, with the grantee or grantees, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, to forever warrant and defend the title to the land conveyed from and against the claims of all persons whomsoever claiming by, through, or under the covenantor or covenantors, his, her, or their heirs or assigns."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after section 8, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 9. That any deed, or part of a deed, which shall fail to conform to the provisions of this bill, shall nevertheless be as valid and effectual, and shall bind the parties thereto, as far as the rules of law and equity will permit, as if it had so conformed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, after section 9, to insert as a new section the following:

SEC. 10. That no covenant or promise by a lessee that he will leave the premises in good repair shall have the effect, if the buildings are destroyed by fire or otherwise without fault or negligence on his part, of binding him to erect such buildings again, or to pay for the same or any part thereof, unless there be other words showing it to be the intent of the parties that he shall be so bound.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator who has the bill in charge whether it is customary to foreclose these mortgages by mere notice?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that that is the customary way of doing it. The only change in the bill from what is the general custom is simplifying the form of the deed so as to avoid the old common law form that was very long, and also to avoid the cost of the recordation, which was so large under that form. But a ten days' notice in a daily newspaper is the usual form of the execution of mortgages.

Mr. ALLEN. The form of deed as prescribed in the bill—I have run through it hastily—is not very different from the form of deed under the common law. There is some change, however. It strikes me that ten days is too short a notice to give a party who has his money invested in property of the purpose to sell under a trust deed, and I move that the word "ten," occurring in line 34, section 4, of the bill be stricken out and the word "sixty" inserted in lieu of it; so as to read:

And after such previous advertisement, not less than sixty days, in a daily newspaper.

Mr. COCKRELL. What will be the effect of the proposed amendment?

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that he is making a mistake in the interest of the debtor there. The cost of such an advertisement for sixty days would be enormous.

Mr. ALLEN. There is no occasion for publishing the notice daily in a daily paper.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator tell me what weekly paper is published here?

Mr. ALLEN. I suppose the daily papers that are published here have weekly editions.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Star and Post do not have weekly editions, and they are the chief newspapers of the city and go into the hands of almost everybody.

Mr. ALLEN. They could publish it once a week for six weeks. In my judgment it is absolutely preposterous to say that a man who has put his money in good faith in real estate should be foreclosed of his title to that real estate or his equity in it by a mere ten days' notice and sale. There are a great many good men who have money in real estate, and who, if they were given thirty or sixty days' notice, could make provision for payment; whereas, if the bill is to pass and they are to have only ten days' notice, they will be absolutely wiped out. They should have a more enlarged opportunity to pay.

Mr. FAULKNER. Suppose I suggest this language to the Senator from Nebraska, which is the ordinary way in the States, "that the same be published once a week for four successive weeks."

Mr. ALLEN. Once a week, say, for eight successive weeks, and that a copy of the notice shall be served upon the person in actual occupancy of the real estate.

Mr. GEORGE. As well as on the grantor.

Mr. ALLEN. As well as on the grantor in the deed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I make no objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. I think the notice may be too long, and it is longer than is given in the States. If we conform the proposed law to what is generally the rule in the States, I think it would be safer.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think there are probably many States in the Union which have laws of this kind. I am familiar with the laws of many of the States west of the Mississippi River, and I know they have not. I suggest this amendment to the Senator from West Virginia: that the word "ten" be stricken out and that the bill be made to read, that the notice shall be printed once a week for eight successive weeks in some daily newspaper of the District, and that a copy of the notice shall be served upon the person in actual occupancy of the real estate as well as the grantor in the trust deed, if he shall live within the District.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Nebraska that he reduce his amendment to writing. It is somewhat long.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall have to reduce it to writing to get it in the form it ought to stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the amendments so far made be concurred in?

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. While the Senator from Nebraska is reducing his amendment to writing I desire to say that the general purport and design of the Senator are very praiseworthy. These sales made on short notice are frequently the cause of very great oppression to the grantors in the deeds of trust, operating to transfer their estates very quickly for a mere nominal sum. I doubt whether the law ought to authorize any sale of mortgaged property to be made except under a decree of court. Sales in pais, made by an unsworn person, frequently and nearly always the nominee of the creditor, are subject to very great abuse, and I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, if it does not go further. I think it would be just to prevent such sales, except in pursuance of a decree of a court of chancery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, there being no unfinished business, the Calendar under Rule IX is the regular order.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that the consideration of the pending bill be continued.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia asks unanimous consent that the consideration of the pending bill be continued. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state, in answer to the Senator from Nebraska, that the bill does not change what is now customary in the District in reference to deeds of trust. The rule is now in operation in reference to all self-executing deeds of trust (and it is the uniform rule, I think, in all the States around here) to have this character of liens, which are self-executing, made without the intervention of the courts, which is the customary way with mortgages. The bill does not seek to change that rule.

Mr. ALLEN. I have drawn the amendment hastily, and it may not be worded exactly as it should be. I move to strike out in lines 34, 35, 36, and 37, section 4, the following words:

Not less than ten days, in a daily newspaper or newspapers printed and published in said District, as to the trustee or trustees, or trustee acting, shall seem most for the interest of all parties concerned.

And to insert the words:

By publishing a notice of the time and place of the sale once each week in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia for eight successive weeks; and a certified copy of such notice shall be personally served on the person in actual occupancy of the real estate and the grantor of the trust deed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not hear the latter part of the proposed amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I may have to change the phraseology. I propose to insert—

By publishing a notice of the time of the sale once each week in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia for eight successive weeks; and a certified copy of such notice shall be personally served on the person in actual occupancy of the real estate and the grantor of the trust deed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out, after the word "advertisement," in line 34, section 4, the following:

Not less than ten days, in a daily newspaper or newspapers printed and published in said District, as to the trustee or trustees, or trustee acting, shall seem most for the interest of all parties concerned.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

By publishing a notice of the time and place of the sale once each week in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia for eight successive weeks, and a certified copy of such notice shall be personally served on the person in actual occupancy of the real estate and the grantor of the trust deed.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to accept an amendment to his amendment by striking out the word "and" between the words "time" and "place," and inserting after the word "place" the words "and terms."

Mr. ALLEN. Yes; that is agreeable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska accept the amendment to the amendment?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment which has been accepted to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend the amendment by striking out the word "and" between the words "time" and "place," and inserting after the word "place" the words "and terms;" so that the amendment will read:

By publishing a notice of the time, place, and terms of the sale, etc., once each week.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Secretary will read the latter part of the amendment again I wish to make a suggestion.

Mr. HUNTON. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow me, I suggest that the notice provided in the amendment for the occupant of the real estate is quite sufficient without requiring a notice to the owner. It is a well-known fact that the owners of real estate in Washington to a very large extent, do not reside in the District, their residence is not known to the trustee, and therefore a notice upon them would entail a great deal of trouble and delay in the enforcement of a deed of trust.

But if the notice is served upon the occupant of the real estate, who would be the tenant of the owner, he would be in communication with his landlord and give the proper notice. I suggest to the Senator the propriety of striking out the notice to the owner, and let it stand a notice to the occupant of the real estate.

Mr. ALLEN. I wished to make a suggestion in that connection. I wish to add the words "if he resides in the District." If the Secretary will read the amendment I will obviate the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

The Secretary read as follows:

And a certified copy of such notice shall be personally served on the person in actual occupancy of the real estate and the grantor of the trust deed.

Mr. ALLEN. I propose to add the words "if he resides in the District."

Mr. HUNTON. That is satisfactory, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. If that amendment is agreeable, it will confine the notice to the owner if he resides in the District.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will not object to that amendment. I think that makes it more definite.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I object to the proposed modification of the amendment. I see no reason why a man who lives outside of the District of Columbia should not be protected in his property as much as a man who resides in it. There is no reason why a man's property should be sacrificed without notice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as now modified.

By publishing a notice of the time, place, and terms of the sale once each week in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia for eight successive weeks; and a certified copy of such notice shall be personally served on the person in actual occupancy of the real estate and the grantor of the trust deed, if he resides in the District.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, it is a very singular proposition that if a man lives outside of the District he shall have his property sold without any notice to him. I think there can be no justification of that. In truth, Mr. President, I am opposed to this whole system of the selling of property of the great mass of the people of the country without any kind of judicial notice or decision, leaving it to them to bring suit to set aside a sale where they are dispossessed of their property by a trustee making his own construction of the instrument under which the sale is made.

But if the system of trusts and instruments by which private individuals dispose of property upon their own judgment, dispossessing the owners of it and leaving them to maintain a suit, shall be allowed to continue, certainly there can be no justification for the provision that if a man lives outside of the District of Columbia his property may be disposed of by a trustee without any notice whatever to him. There is to be merely a publication for eight weeks in a weekly newspaper, which may escape the notice of the nonresident, there being no kind of notice served upon him personally, and his property is to be disposed of upon the ground that he does not live in the District of Columbia.

Mr. President, I think it is not a very great hardship upon a creditor loaning money upon the security of property to be required to find out the residence of the person who is the obligor, the grantor in the deed, and to serve the notice on him. The occupant may be a mere tenant for a few months and may have no interest whatever in communicating the fact to the grantor. The grantor may be absent or he may have an agent who has failed to notify him. Certainly there should be some protection to the nonresident.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to inquire of the President whether a motion to recommit the bill is in order at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. ALLEN. Then, I move that the bill be recommitted to the committee from which it emanated, the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to bring in a bill requiring the foreclosure of all trust deeds and mortgages in a court of equity before the right of the equitable holder can be extinguished and do away entirely with the system of advertisement and sale of property of citizens who have invested their money and who have been compelled to give a mortgage or trust deed to secure the deferred payments.

The trust deeds are used as a mere cutthroat affair. They are used by money sharks for the purpose of getting rid of a class of purchasers who are not always able to meet their obligations as soon as they mature, and thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars are lost to the poor and worthy people in consequence of this iniquitous system of sale on notice. I am not in favor of a law which gives the debtor an undue advantage at all, but I favor a law which is consonant with the laws of a majority of the States of the Union, and that is just to all, and that the system of sale by mere notice shall be destroyed and the system of foreclosure in a court of equity introduced in lieu of it.

There are very few States in the Union to-day that permit a sale under a trust deed by mere notice. I refer to the foreclosure of trust deeds on land. Of course with chattel mortgages and contracts of that kind they do it. But the courts look upon these sales with a great deal of suspicion whenever they do take place. It is not an unusual thing, it is almost a daily transaction for a court of equity to interpose by its decree and set aside a sale such as is authorized by this bill. If a man has bought property in this District, and has paid one-half or one-third or any other considerable sum, and has been compelled to give a trust deed for the deferred payments, is there any reason in the world why he should not have some time at least when his obligations mature to procure the money to meet them?

Is it not simply an iniquity that under a law like the one proposed here, in ten or fifteen days his creditor can sell him out of house and home and absorb all the money he has put in the property? Why should not the creditor be compelled to go to a court of equity, which weighs the matter carefully and weighs the equity, and add the protection of that court in preserving his right in the property? The right of the purchaser of the property is certainly as sacred as the right of the vendor. It is probably all he has in the world. It is probable that it is the only roof that shelters his wife and children, and why should he not have his day in court before his property is sold and his family turned into the street?

There is scarcely a State in the Union to-day that does not require parties holding mortgages and trust deeds to go into a court of equity. Why should a man in the District of Columbia who is dealing in real estate have superior advantages to the citizens of the Union elsewhere? Why should he not, when he sells property and takes his mortgage, understand that he must go into a court of equity and submit the equities of his claim to a court before he can sell out the house and home of his purchaser? Not only that, sir, but these trustee sales are used as a means of oppression. They are used for the purpose of oppressing the grantor in the trust deed.

For the purpose of getting an extension of time, sometimes the grantor in the trust deed gives a mortgage upon his household effects, and perhaps upon everything he has that is vendable and that can be sold on the street, and, after awhile, failing to redeem those things, not only the real property itself is sold, but under the mortgage that is given the personal property of the debtor is sold, too, and an enormous bill of costs is taxed up to the grantor in the trust deed, to be paid by him.

Mr. President, I move that the bill be recommitted, with instructions to so reform it or to present a bill requiring the creditor to go into a court of equity to foreclose the trust deed before he can obtain title to the trust property.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I hope the motion of the Senator from Nebraska will not be carried. Certainly I am not here for the purpose of bringing into a District that for years, perhaps since its organization as a District, has operated under certain principles in the carrying out of the provisions of law touching deeds of trust, a system that changes the entire practice upon which that business has grown up and providing another form that takes entirely different proceedings in order to accomplish the results. I oppose the amendment upon another ground. I oppose it upon the ground that in the practice of carrying these mortgages through the courts, the lawyer, the clerks, and the commissioners, and the auditors eat up all the estate that the creditor does not eat up.

Mr. GEORGE. Why not limit their fees?

Mr. FAULKNER. You can not pass a bill here which limits the fees of lawyers. You can not pass a bill here which limits the fees of the auditors and clerks as to this particular matter, differing entirely from that of all other equity proceedings before the courts of the District of Columbia. Sir, under such a principle you would put confusion absolutely into all questions as to what are proper and legal charges by officers of the court, and you would even go to the extent of putting in a provision in reference to lawyers' fees, providing that they are to charge a certain amount for carrying a case through court.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. FAULKNER. I yield, of course.

Mr. ALLEN. Does the Senator propose that the solicitor for the plaintiff shall obtain his fee from the defendant? Is that the purpose of the proposed law?

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Nebraska that under the proposed law there is no solicitor in the case; there is no lawyer in the case; there are no fees and no liabilities that the creditor has to pay under the deed of trust, which is the form provided in the bill, and which is the uniform practice in the District, except the debt and its interest, the cost of the advertisement, and the cost of the execution of the deed itself. That is done by the trustee named in the deed. There are no other legal expenses that can come out of the fund upon the sale of the property, whereas if you put the indebtedness in the form of a mortgage, you have to file one of the most expensive proceedings known to the courts, an equity proceeding. You have to go before an equity court.

The trustee or the creditor will have to employ a lawyer, and the fees of the losing party are always taxed as a part of the costs. The legal fees, not the fee agreed upon between the counsel and the client, but the fees allowed by law are taxed in as part of the costs. Then there are all the clerks' costs, which run up very rapidly in equity proceedings. Then the case is referred to an auditor, and the auditor summons the parties before him to prove the case. Thus the costs of the auditor and the witnesses and all, which are very high in the District of Columbia, are incurred in cases where there is not a disputed question involved in the proceeding, because if there is a disputed question, under the well-recognized practice in the District of Columbia and all the States adjoining it, where the powers of a self-executing deed of trust are involved the court has jurisdiction at once to pass upon the disputed point.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish the Senator from West Virginia would explain a point for my benefit. I have not been a purchaser or owner of real estate here, and I should like to know just how the title passes under one of these deeds of trust, and what evidence appears upon the record of its having changed.

Mr. FAULKNER. Under the present law, and that is simply what the bill is trying to remedy, a man will borrow money or buy property. Owing a debt, of course he executes a deed of trust, which is a conveyance of the property, and as the title is then vested in him by virtue of the deed from the original owner, he at once, if it is a purchase of property, transfers it to a third party, who is called a trustee.

It, on its face, vests an absolute title in the trustee. The deed has a provision authorizing the trustee in case of default, under certain terms and conditions, to make sale of the property. It is advertised and sold to the highest bidder. Then the trustee, when the purchaser at the trustee's sale has complied with the terms of the sale by paying the purchase money, executes to him, the purchaser, a deed which conveys to him all the right, title, and interest that was vested in the trustee, which had been formerly vested in the original grantor.

Mr. HAWLEY. Without any resort to the courts at all?

Mr. FAULKNER. Without any resort whatever to the courts. That is the uniform practice in the District. If a man borrows money and has real estate, he executes a deed of trust to that real estate to a trustee agreed upon by himself and the creditor, providing how long a time he shall have the money, what interest he shall pay, and providing in the deed of trust that if he makes default the property shall be sold under certain terms, which is generally about two weeks notice in a daily newspaper. At that time, of course, the same proceedings are adopted by the trustee. He advertises the property and sells it; pays the creditor his indebtedness, takes out a commission of 2 per cent for his trouble, and the surplus, if any, he pays over to the debtor.

I will state that in the practical execution of deeds of trust in this section of the country, both in the District and in all the surrounding States, there is not one in ten thousand deeds of trust ever forced to a foreclosure or to a sale. It is a safe way of securing money, but not one in ten thousand of these deeds that are given are ever forced to a sale of the property described in them, if the debtor pays before the default. Under the present system, unfortunately it having vested an absolute title in the trustee under the common law which governs in this District, the trustee has to make a regular conveyance, a deed of bargain and sale from himself back to the original owner, so as to vest the title that was conveyed to him under the deed of trust back in the original owner, which is not only costly in its execution, but it is also costly in its recordation.

The object of the bill is to conform with those provisions in other State statutes which allow him simply to execute a short release to saying the debtor has discharged the liability contained in the deed of trust, and that short release by operation of law, as provided for in this proposed statute, reinvests the original owner with the property and its title.

Mr. President, I am not willing, and I hope the Senate will not be willing, to vote to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to bring in a bill to change the entire system that has grown up here in reference to the loaning of money and the securing of deferred payments. I think it would be exceedingly prejudicial to the business interests of this District if any such bill was brought in and passed, and I for that reason sincerely hope that it will not be done.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, I should not wish to interfere by a statute with any long existing system of conveyances or foreclosures; but I will tell the Senator from West Virginia what our old-fashioned way is in Connecticut. We are a very simple-minded folk in Connecticut. A mortgage is the usual conveyance, with a condition that if such and such a sum is not paid the ownership shall pass, or if such debt is paid it shall be free again to the original owner; but when it is necessary to foreclose a mortgage to collect the debt, to acquire full title to the property, a very simple petition is presented to the court. There is no dispute, probably, about the debt. The court asks, How much is this property worth? Perhaps $3,500. What is the debt? Perhaps it is $1,800. The court says: "This is abundant security, and there is no hardship in giving a year for the redemption;" and it makes a decree accordingly. It is all very simple; and I suggest to the Senator that it is much less liable to cruel abuse than this system of his which we in the East have the fashion of calling cut-throat mortgages.

Mr. ALLEN. I am glad to see the distinguished Senator from Connecticut take the position he does in reference to this matter. Certainly there can be no excuse for this bill in its present form, except to comply with the requirements of a certain class of money lenders who desire their money at all hazards and at any sacrifice to the debtor, and who desire to fix the time when the debtor's interest in the property can be extinguished.

Now, the Senator from West Virginia, I would infer from what he said, believes that it is perfectly proper (and I do not know but that is the custom in the District; I do not know what the custom is here) to charge up a counsel fee or solicitor fee to the debtor. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia if this is customary?

Mr. FAULKNER. I can not state what is customary in this District. I can only state what is customary in my own State, and in the adjoining States where I have practiced. There is a regular allowance of an attorney fee that is always charged up as a part of the cost against the party who loses in the proceeding. That amount of the attorney fee is fixed by statute.

Mr. ALLEN. If that is true it furnishes an additional reason for the recommittal of the bill. There is no kind of equity or justice in even permitting a condition in a mortgage or trust deed by which the owner can tax counsel fees to the defendant.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Nebraska did not correctly understand me. There is no tax of attorney fee under the system that is in operation to-day or that would be in operation under this bill in reference to deeds of trust. I am speaking of litigation in courts of equity.

Mr. ALLEN. I understood the Senator from West Virginia perfectly. If there is a court of equity in the District of Columbia that awards solicitors' fees to the plaintiff in cases of foreclosure or in other equitable cases, making that a rule I mean, or that allows the successful party in a law action to recover an attorney's fee, then the sooner Congress changes that rule and wipes it out, the better off the people of this District will be and the sooner Congress will discharge its duty to that people of the District. Whenever a man takes a trust deed or mortgage and fixes his rate of interest he fixes it with a view of covering every possible contingency that can arise. The rate of interest that he draws upon his bond fixes the measure of liability of the defendant on the contract.

Now, I suggest to the Senator from West Virginia—and I speak to him because he is familiar with the rule here—if there is any law or practice of that kind in this District, the propriety of bringing in a bill here promptly changing the rule and introducing a rule in this District that is somewhat just and somewhat humane. It is an absolute iniquity that every conceivable burden shall be placed upon the maker of a mortgage or a trust deed that the will, whim, or caprice of the grantee of the trust may see fit to impose upon him.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is not the case in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ALLEN. And Congress should now, if it has not before done so, put an end to that kind of practice so far as it has authority to do it. If it has not done it in the past it should seize the most favorable opportunity in the future to change the rule that seems to prevail in this District.

Mr. President, the rule introduced by this bill is unjust in another respect. It gives the credit or the sole power of determining when and how he will foreclose. What right, what equity has the creditor——

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, he is entirely mistaken. The creditor has no power to determine when he will foreclose. The determination under a deed of trust is fixed by an actual agreement between the parties when the transaction is made, and before the deed is executed, or at least at the time when the deed is executed.

Mr. ALLEN. It is always fixed. It is perfectly proper to consider, in determining this measure, that the creditor stands at an advantage over the debtor in making the contract. We, who are familiar with these contracts by having had them in court, know that the grantor in the trust deed is put to every disadvantage in the execution of the contract. Now, that being true, why should the holder of the trust have it in his power to foreclose and wipe out the existence of the debtor within a very few days by a simple notice of sale? When he undertakes to and does sell by a single notice, is not that an act wholly within his own control? Does he not deprive the grantor in the trust deed or the mortgagor of going before a judicial tribunal for the purpose of having it determined whether he has not waived some of the conditions of his contract?

Mr. FAULKNER. No, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will state that he does not. If there is any dispute arising out of the question of the execution of the deed or default in its terms, and the trustee seeks to execute it, it is absolutely in the power of a debtor to appeal to a court of equity and enjoin the execution of the sale.

Mr. GEORGE. He has to give bond?

Mr. ALLEN. How can he appeal to a court of equity?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not necessary to give bond unless he asks for an injunction in reference to real estate. It is only a question as to cost, and not a question that grows out of damages.

Mr. ALLEN. If the grantor of the trust deed is able to enjoin the sale under the deed, then ordinarily he is able to pay the obligation and there is no necessity of a sale. But if he is like nine-tenths of the persons who are seeking to build up homes in this city and the creditor can come along with his trust deed and turn him out of doors, it is sarcasm of the coldest kind to that man to say he can go into a court of equity and enjoin the sale under the trust deed and settle it in a court of equity. He must give a bond in a sum to be fixed by the court of equity where he applies for his writ of injunction. He must have money to pay a lawyer with. He must have money with which to pay clerk's costs and court costs. He must have all these things before he is even admitted to the doors of the court to present his case. Now, that is a great consolation to a man who has lost every cent he has by a proceeding of this kind.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from Nebraska permit me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is it not the same thing as if a mortgage was foreclosed through the courts?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is, if there is any surplus value of the real estate over and above the liability created by the indebtedness, because then it is taken out of this surplus.

Mr. ALLEN. If the plaintiff is required to go into a court of equity and foreclose his trust deed or mortgage the respondent has a right to go in without any costs or expense to him and contest the plaintiff's claim. There is not a dollar of expense to him except such as he may incur for counsel fees. There are no costs for him to pay. He is entitled as a matter of right to go there and make a defense.

Now, suppose as a matter of fact he can show that the plaintiff has waived the obligations of the contract in some respect. Suppose he can show payment or extension or any other defense that is admissible in a court of equity, should he be deprived of any of these rights and privileges by a mere sale by notice without an opportunity to go before a competent tribunal and have his day in court? That is all I claim. I claim that in at least two-thirds of the States of this Union it is impossible to foreclose a deed of trust like this without going into a court of equity, and I know of no reason why gentlemen doing business in this District should be exempt from the performance of the same duty. If they have been doing business otherwise, if they have been taking the poor people who purchase homes by the neck and throwing them into the street, it is high time for Congress to introduce a new and more humane rule in this District.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, there are some considerations connected with this question which have not been brought before the Senate, and which I think ought to have a very material weight in determining the propriety of the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

In the first place, a sale made by one of these trustees always conveys a suspicious title. Purchasers of real estate do not bid freely at such sales, and for manifest reasons. First, in the lapse of some time afterwards a contest may arise as to the regularity of the sale in an action of ejectment, and when such contest arises it would be the duty of the purchaser to prove that the notice was given in accordance with the deed of trust. He might find it impossible to do that.

In the next place, the purchaser at one of these sales is not strictly under the rule of a bona fide purchaser without notice. If the debt be void, as on a gambling consideration, and there is nothing in the record to disclose invalidity of the debt, then the purchaser at the sale would be liable to lose his amount afterwards upon proof of the invalidity of the debt. That is another reason why purchasers outside do not bid. Another reason is, if the debt be extinguished or partly extinguished before the sale and the sale is made for the whole debt, then the purchaser loses the benefit of his purchase.

So there are other objections to foreclosures, as we lawyers say, in pais, without judicial determination, besides the mere chance of ruining the debtor. The sales are suspected. Sales of that sort never bring full fruits. They are generally consummated by nobody bidding except the creditor. He becomes the purchaser at just such a price as he sees proper.

Then there is another consideration, Mr. President, which I omitted at the proper time to state. The trustee never makes a warrant of title. That is another reason why persons will not bid at these sales, or bid with reluctance.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. GEORGE. Let me get through with my statement. Then I will yield for an interruption. So these sales are of that peculiar character and nature which necessarily produce small fruits.

Then there are one or two other reasons why a court of equity should administer these trusts or trust deeds rather than have it done by a mere private trustee who is nearly always the mere agent and frequently the tool of the creditor. If a sale be made under the order of a chancery court and it brings a very low price and that is shown to the court the court will not confirm it but will order a resale. So on a resale a fair price may be received; and then there is another rule. If any man, after a sale is made under a decree in chancery, will come into court before confirmation and say, "I will advance on the bid made by the purchaser;" that is, to make myself perfectly understood, suppose the sale be made for $1,000 and a third party will come into the court before confirmation and say, "I will give $500 more," that is, "I will give $1,500 for this property," then the court says to the purchaser, "Now, unless you will give $1,500 you shall not have the property."

So under a sale by judicial decree we first have several very important matters settled beyond any controversy whatever. If the debt is invalid, then if the decree is that it is valid, the party having had his day once in court can never afterwards litigate it. So the purchaser will bid with the certainty that the amount ascertained by the decree of the court is actually due. That is one advantage.

Another advantage is that the records of the court will show whether the sale was regular or not, and on confirmation there can be no further controversy about the regularity of the sale. The third advantage is the one which I have just mentioned, that under a decree by a court of chancery the chances are very great that there will not be that sacrifice of the property which almost universally takes place when a sale is made by a trustee upon mere proceedings in pais.

For all these reasons, as we have the matter now up, the law should be so amended that there shall be no sale of land except under the judicial decree of a court, ascertaining the amount due, fixing the terms of the sale, and then reserving to the court the right, after the sale is made, to inquire whether justice has been done, and to refuse confirmation unless there has been a fair sale.

With all these things, it does seem to me that we should not be doing a good thing if we allowed, while this bill was under consideration, the old method, which nearly always produced bad results and frequently very gross injustices, to go on and be perpetuated in this district.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Mississippi, before he sits down, whether he proposes to altogether deprive a debtor who possesses real estate of making that real estate a security which would enable him to borrow money on it, and secure the payment of that money to his creditor at a fixed day? That is the point of all this legislation. If it is desirable to have a judicial ascertainment of the regularity of a sale, the parties ought to be at liberty to get it when they so desire. It is desirable to have all the equity powers vested in the courts which will protect a debtor against usurious or oppressive conduct on the part of the creditor and, of course, which will protect him against a violation of the contract. Still, the essence of mercantile dealing and of mercantile safety is that a creditor shall be entitled to know and to be sure that he shall have his money on the day he stipulates, so that he can keep his contract. That is the essence of all good commerce.

If a debtor borrows money on any security, where that object is not attained the debtor has to compensate for the risk by paying extortionate rates. That is the universal experience of mankind. The payment at the day ought to be secured, and you can not secure the payment at the day by a mortgage if you must have a lawsuit, which may be carried to one, two, or a half dozen courts before you get through with it.

We had this whole thing to go over in Massachusetts. Our people were very much opposed to what they called the power of sale mortgage. They had the old three years redemption, and they changed their policy with great reluctance for the reason stated so clearly and strongly by the Senator from Mississippi, but they changed their policy thirty-two years ago, in 1852, and there is nobody in our State, if our experience is worth anything, who wishes to go back to the old plan. I think that all classes of persons agree that it is better to have it in the power of the parties to contract for a security which will secure absolute punctuality in payment, and that where that can not be done the person who suffers by it is the debtor and not the creditor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the considerations so forcibly presented by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] had not escaped my observation and contemplation. I am well aware that in mercantile matters and in all businesses promptness and punctuality are very great virtues, and I should do nothing, if I could help it, which would tend to decrease the chances for prompt and punctual payment; but upon very full consideration of the adverse arguments upon the one side and the other, I have concluded, first, that in most transactions which are made, punctuality is secured and credit is given upon that security by the character of the debtor for meeting his engagements. Probably in ninety-nine cases in a hundred punctuality is secured in that way as the known credit of the debtor.

Mr. HARRIS. Then, why the necessity for a mortgage?

Mr. GEORGE. That is for ultimate security. To show the Senator from Tennessee that I am right about it, I will say that the mortgage and the deed of trust never do in fact secure payment on the day; they only secure payment at some time after default. There must be a default before there can be a sale, just as much as there must be a default before there can be a suit in equity. So I think when we consider all which I have alleged heretofore, it will be found that whilst there are some very strong reasons in favor of the prompt settlement, as urged by the Senator from Massachusetts, yet the weight of the inconveniences and of the troubles and of the chances for oppression and wrong arising from these sales in pais lie on the side of these prompt sales. In every other thing, except where a mortgage or a deed of trust is taken—I believe they constiute a large majority of the transactions of mankind—you get your payment on the day alleged from the known ability and character of the promisor or debtor, and in case he fails, the creditor must resort to a court of law or a court of chancery, as the case may be, to enforce his rights.

So, upon the whole, especially as the protection given by the motion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is to those who are not, as a general rule, so able to take care of themselves as the other side, I think we had better give our legislation on that side.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. President, as I understand the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska and enforced by the argument of the Senator from Mississippi, it is to confine real security for the payment of debts to a mortgage instead of a deed of trust. As the law stands now, a debtor and creditor, one about to secure the debt due to the other, can make his selection and either secure it by a mortgage or secure it by a deed of trust. That practice and that privilege have prevailed in the District of Columbia ever since it has been the District of Columbia. One portion of the District was ceded by Maryland and the other portion by Virginia. The laws of those two States were brought into the District of Columbia, and from the laws of those two States the parties have had the privilege ever since this has been the District of Columbia to secure a debt either by a mortgage or by a deed of trust.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Senator say what has been the practice?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir; that has been the practice and that is the law.

Mr. PLATT. Both forms of security are resorted to?

Mr. HUNTON. Both; either a deed of trust or a mortgage.

Mr. HARRIS. The contracting parties settle for themselves which course they will adopt.

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, sir. That having prevailed here as the law of the District of Columbia ever since its cession by the States of Maryland and Virginia, the people being perfectly satisfied with that state of affairs, not desiring, so far as we are advised, any change confining the security for debts upon real estate to mortgages instead of deeds of trust, I can not see why the Senate of the United States should undertake to enforce upon the people of this District a single method of securing a debt on real estate out of the two methods.

If there are evils attending the enforcement of a deed of trust, when the debtor and creditor get together and want to give security one to the other on real estate, and they think the evils which have been portrayed by the two Senators exist as to a deed of trust, let the creditor take a mortgage; that, of course, will meet all the difficulties the two Senators have made; but if the parties do not agree with those two Senators, and say "We prefer the cheaper mode of securing this debt and the cheaper mode of enforcing the execution of the security," then they may, under the law as it now stands and under the bill under consideration, take the deed of trust in preference to the mortgage.

I ask again, why deprive the people of the District of Columbia of that right of preference when they undertake as intelligent men, able to contract, to choose between these two methods of securing the debt?

Mr. President, I do not sympathize with a great deal which has been said here, because I believe that the very moment you put obstacles in the way of collecting a debt if secured upon real property, that very moment you make the borrowing of money more difficult to the debtor, and in proportion to the difficulties of collecting a loan secured upon real estate, you make it more difficult for the honest man to borrow money for the necessary purposes of his trade or his business. Therefore I, for one, as a friend of the persons who sometimes are obliged to borrow money, would make the execution of the deed of trust on any security for the repayment of that money as easy and as cheap as possible.

One objection of the Senator from Mississippi is that a deed of trust does not warrant the title. A deed made by a court under foreclosure proceedings does not warrant the title either. and I beg to inform my friend from Mississippi that there is not one deed in a hundred executed out of court between Mr. A and Mr. B in the sale of property which contains a general warranty provision. The deeds in the District of Columbia are in effect almost invariably quitclaim deeds. I, for one, am not willing to take away from the people of the District of Columbia a system of borrowing money either by deed of trust or by mortgage, under which they have lived nearly one hundred years, and force them into the adoption of one or the other of those modes. I desire to see them have the right to secure their debts either by deed of trust or by mortgage, and the object of the bill under consideration is to more effectually provide for the execution of a deed of trust.

Mr. PLATT. Will the Chair please state what is the precise question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair understands that the question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia with instructions.

Mr. PLATT. What amendment has been made on the fourth page from lines 34 to 37?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that pending that amendment the motion to recommit was made.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will state to the Senator from Connecticut, however, that I agreed not to oppose the amendment submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. PLATT. That amendment is with reference to making more specific the notice which shall be given in case of sale?

Mr. FAULKNER. The amendment provides for publication once a week for eight successive weeks, and that notice shall be served upon the person in actual occupancy of the property and also the grantor.

I wish to suggest to the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from Mississippi whether it is fair or proper at this time to bring up the question which is involved in the motion of the Senator from Nebraska? The bill now before the Senate is not a bill to change any law as it exists as to the form of the security for debt; it is only as to the mere form of the deed, not at all as to the practice whether it shall be a mortgage or a deed of trust.

The bill simply provides that if the security be a deed of trust, the form of the deed shall be so and so. It does not alter any of the practices or any of the usages or any of the customs of the law which authorizes a deed of trust to be given with the power of sale as now existing in the District of Columbia.

Under those circumstances, I am satisfied that the Senate will see that it would not be proper to recommit the bill (which does not attempt in any form to change the law of the District of Columbia as it exists, except as to the forms of conveyance) in order to change an entire system which has been in existence for over a hundred years, and with which the people of the District of Columbia are thoroughly familiar.

Mr. President, I venture to say that there are thousands and thousands of deeds on record here through the building associations of this District—and I wish to say that the District of Columbia has been built up through these building associations to a very great extent—and yet every deed is in the form of a deed of trust. Senators are familiar with the newspapers of the District of Columbia; they read them daily, and see the advertisements under the forms of these deeds of trust, and they at once recognize that not one in ten thousand of these deeds of trust are ever based actually on the execution or sale for the purpose of securing the debts; but the people here being familiar with this character of security and knowing its promptness, money is loaned freely upon it without any hesitation, the debtors are accommodated, and no injury results from it.

Mr. HOAR. Savings banks are in the same position.

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course, savings banks are in exactly the same position.

I wish to say that there is not a single legal objection made by my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], in whose opinion I certainly have the very highest confidence on any question of law, which is not thoroughly provided for in the decisions of the courts of the District of Columbia in reference to the protection of any debtor from the grasping claim or improper mode of a creditor under a deed of trust. If there has been a partial payment and the trustee attempts to sell for more than is due, that gives a court of equity jurisdiction at once to stop the sale. If it is a gambling debt or a usurious debt there is absolute jurisdiction in the court of equity to stop the sale. There is no ground upon which a trustee can make a sale under one of these self-executing deeds, except when there is no subject of dispute as between the debtor and the creditor.

In every other instance, not having had his day in court, the courts are open to that debtor. An investigation at once takes place by an impartial tribunal, in case of any dispute. The title of the purchaser is exactly the same. The purchaser who buys at a trustee's sale and the purchaser who buys at a commissioner's sale are purchasers caveat emptor, and bound by that title after confirmation, no matter what may be its defects. That is the decision in this jurisdiction and the decision in the jurisdiction in which I reside, and I suppose the decision in every other jurisdiction. A purchaser who ascertains that his title is absolutely void, if that title has been confirmed by the first decree after the sale, has no remedy in a court, and must even continue to pay the second and third deferred payments. As to the title which the purchaser obtains at a trustee's sale, it is identically the same title which is obtained from the court, and the court gives him no title, but a special warranty.

Mr. GEORGE. There is this very great difference between the title the purchaser gets at a sale under a chancery decree and the title which he gets under a sale by a trustee by proceedings in pais; that, in the first case, at the sale under a chancery decree, whilst the purchaser gets no guarantee of the title beyond the grantor's in the deed, he always gets that title, always gets the title of the grantor of the deed or the debtor; and in the other case the man gets nothing but a lawsuit, in which the chances are that he may fail, because he has to prove, when suit is brought to test the validity of the sale, the regularity of it from the very beginning. All those questions are settled by the proceedings in the chancery court.

Mr. FAULKNER. I must beg leave to some extent, at least, to differ from my distinguished friend from Mississippi. The title of the purchaser, so far as the right and title of the grantor even in the deed, stands upon the same footing in a commissioner's sale by the court as by a trustee's sale. In order to secure good title you have to employ a lawyer to examine the court proceedings to see if the entire proceedings are regular.

If they are irregular, that at once affects the title; but in the hands of the purchaser and in the case of a trustee your examination as to title of the property is much simpler than examination of the question of process and the service of process and all that is essential in case of a proceeding in court.

Both rest upon the fact that the powers of the court as well as the powers of the trustee have been executed in accordance with the forms of law; but if either have failed to comply with the provisions of the law, the court or the trustee, then the purchaser's title is at once affected, and you have to examine the regularity of both proceedings in order to ascertain as to the validity of the title conveyed, either at a trustee's sale or at a commissioner's sale; in other words, I say the purchaser of this property stands upon the principle of caveat emptor before the court.

I was proceeding to say—because I understood that the inference from the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Mississippi was that perhaps a better warranty was given by a court than by a trustee—that there is no warranty given in a judicial proceeding. In order to get any warranty whatsoever there must be a consent order, and the parties must sign the deed in order to execute a covenant of warranty in a proceeding before a court in the sale of land. The court sells such title as it thinks is in the party who is liable for the debt; the trustee sells such title as has been conveyed to him by reason of the provisions of the deed, and no other title is conveyed; a special warranty is all that any of them get.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN. In the case of a court, where the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, is its decree not obligatory upon them?

Mr. FAULKNER. It depends altogether on whether the parties are properly before the court.

Mr. ALLEN. I say if all the parties are before the court.

Mr. FAULKNER. Absolutely so.

Mr. ALLEN. Unless set aside by some other proceeding.

Now, take another case, the case of a trustee's sale. If a sale is made by a trustee and he has given notice in the papers or otherwise, as the trust deed provides, and that sale is in irregular form, it is not conclusive upon those parties notwithstanding they have had notice.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not; but there is greater difficulty in ascertaining whether the parties are properly before the court than there is in ascertaining whether the proceedings in reference to the form of advertisement of the sale by the trustee has conformed to the provisions of law; but you do not get title there. You must then go back of the proceedings of the court and ascertain what title there is in the party by the records of the court, both in the trust sale as well as in the case of the sale by the commissioners of the court; and all that is devolved upon the purchaser just as well in the one proceeding as in the other.

But I do not care about going on to discuss these questions. I do not think we ought to attempt to change the entire system which has grown up here and been in existence under the laws of this District, a system with which the people have been familiar for over a hundred years, on a motion to recommit a bill, which does not affect the question in any way whatever. In no manner, shape, or form does this bill affect the question as to whether a law shall subsequently be passed here requiring all forms of security to be by mortgage instead of by deeds of trust. That can be done by subsequent proceedings and by the passage of a subsequent law, if the Senator from Nebraska thinks it proper. All that we of the Committee on the District of Columbia ask to-day is that if debtors adopt the trust deed, which they have a right to adopt now, they will not spread it out into six or eight pages, but adopt the short legal form provided in almost all the statutes of our States, and comply with that in order to save the cost of deeds as well as the cost of recordation. For that reason I hope the Senate will not agree to the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to recommit the bill.

Mr. CULLOM. I shall not discuss the subject specially, because I am not familiar with the provisions of the bill reported; but I desire simply to say that the practice to sell under trust deeds without the necessity of going into court has been the law of many of the States for a good many years; but I am inclined to think that the States which have had that authority heretofore are not exercising it to the extent that they formerly did. In my own State, for instance, I know it has been the custom there to take a trust deed as security for a loan, and under the law incorporate in that trust deed such requirements as would authorize the trustee named to sell the property without going into court after the specified time in the trust deed, or in the statute, if there happens to be a statute upon that subject. In my own State I find upon examination of the statute—and I had that impression before making the examination, though I did not recollect it very clearly—that State has within a few years passed an act prohibiting the sale of any man's property under a trust deed, except through a proceeding in court; and I shall read the section of the law which prevailed in that State when a sale could be made without going into court. The statute was pretty carefully drawn, I think. It provided:

> In all sales of real estate under a mortgage, or trust deed in the nature of a mortgage, executed after the taking effect of this act, which may be made pursuant to a power of sale, at least thirty days' previous notice of such intended sale shall be given, whether so specified in the power of sale or not.

I do not know what the provision in this bill is, but I believe as it was first reported it only required ten days' notice in some newspaper, without specifying what newspaper it should be, whether one which was issued every day or once a week, or whether it was ever seen to any considerable extent.

> It shall be sufficient to insert in such notice the date of the instrument, names of the grantor and grantee, and of the assigns, if any, the amount of indebtedness the instrument was given to secure, the amount claimed to be due, a description of the premises to be sold, and the time, place, and terms of the sale; and no sale shall be made except in the county in which the premises are situated. The notice shall be given by publication once in each week, for four successive weeks, in some newspaper or other paper authorized by law to publish legal notices, published in the county or counties where the premises are situated, or if no paper is published in such county, the nearest newspaper published in this State, etc.

The statute then proceeds to describe the particular mode of advertisement that should be required before the sale could be made without going into court for the purpose of securing a decree. Subsequent to the passage of that act, this act was passed in my State:

> That no real estate within this State, shall be sold by virtue of any power of sale, contained in any mortgage, trust deed, or other conveyance in the nature of a mortgage, executed after the taking effect of this act; but all such mortgages, trust deeds, or other conveyances in the nature of a mortgage, shall only be foreclosed, in the manner provided for foreclosing mortgages containing no power of sale; and no real estate shall be sold to satisfy any such mortgage, trust deed, or other conveyance in the nature of a mortgage, except in pursuance of a judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that that is a just law, and that the power of sale as it has been exercised in many of the States and, as I understand, in this District, by virtue of the terms of the trust deed, without resorting to a court at all, ought to be prohibited, as it has been in some of the States, as in my own. I understand it to be the fact that in many of the States no such power has ever been given at all.

Mr. GEORGE. What is the date of the law which the Senator from Illinois has read?

Mr. CULLOM. Eighteen hundred and seventy-nine, I think.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to ask the Senator another question. Has he observed any inconvenience, or wrong, or oppression coming from the passage of that law?

Mr. CULLOM. I have not. I know from experience and from observation that sometimes creditors who have trust deeds upon property, which they think may be depreciated by delay, have sought to hasten sales the moment the time named in the trust deeds expired under which a sale could be ordered. While that is living up to the letter of the contract it is not the policy of the law or of the country, as I think, that there should be such exacting and prompt action with reference to sales under trust deeds, which do, as the Senator from Mississippi says, carry with them a somewhat dubious character of title. I think it is the better policy that the law itself should prescribe that in every case of the foreclosure of a trust deed or of a mortgage there should be a decree of a court determining the amount due and the time within which the sale shall take place. I do not think such a law will work any hardship; I believe it will work to the advantage of exact fairness between the debtor and the creditor in most instances.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to ask the Senator whether on a bill of this character he would want to involve the Senate in that question?

Mr. CULLOM. I do not really know what the nature of the bill is, except that it seems to involve this question from what I caught in the discussion of the subject on the part of the Senators.

Mr. FAULKNER. The object of this bill is simply to change the form of deeds of trust and deeds of bargain and sale and other matters of that character in the District of Columbia, without in any way affecting the law as it exists to-day, except as to the form of deeds.

Mr. CULLOM. If this is making a form, it seems to me we ought to make the form right.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask whether there is any provision in this bill regulating the sale, the notice, and all that sort of thing under mortgage by trustees?

Mr. FAULKNER. Under deeds of trust.

Mr. GEORGE. Powers of sale under mortgage?

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the point I make.

Mr. CULLOM. I think there is no better time to change the law of the District than right now in connection with this bill. It would seem to me so.

Mr. FAULKNER. I hope the Senate will not agree to the pending motion.

Mr. GEORGE. I want to be indulged in a single observation only, and that is that the argument of the Senator from West Virginia is the old-time plea of wrong and oppression, "this is not a convenient time to correct it."

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, I think, with all respect to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON], that the law of the District of Columbia has not been for a hundred years that there was such a thing as deeds of trust with power to sell. If I understand the subject, the English law from time immemorial by virtue of the jurisdiction of a court of equity—not of a statute of England—always provided that however absolute a deed might be, even an absolute deed of conveyance, if it were to secure a debt a court of equity restrained the deed and created the equity of redemption in favor of the debtor, and the law of England became the law of the District of Columbia.

It has been a modern idea that this power of sale excluding the jurisdiction of the court in the first instance should exist. The argument of the Senator from West Virginia is this: Here is a man who borrows a sum of money and executes a mortgage upon the only property he has, no matter whether it be a loan association or an individual. This is all the means he has. The creditor steps in and says, "This money is due; you have not paid me anything." The debtor says, "I have paid you a part of the debt." The creditor says, "I, through my trustee, will sell this property;" and he does sell it. "I will impose upon you the obligation for your protection of being the suitor."

In the other case, of a mortgage, he comes into court and the judge, if he be an honest man, enforces the rights as they appear in the record, whether there be a lawyer or be not a lawyer in the case. In the one case, the Senator from West Virginia says the debtor is protected by this power of sale, without the construction of any judicial tribunal.

Mr. President, it seems to me very clear that money will always be had where security is good for the ultimate payment, the ultimate security, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] says. Money seeks investment and use. I have never known a case when money was comparatively easy in any country where, upon good security, upon interest paying property, income-paying property, money could not be borrowed, and where persons having it were not glad to loan it upon securities of that description.

There is no need, as a matter of public policy, of putting the debtor to this trouble. Nine-tenths of the debtors of the country are men of small means; the business of the country is done by men of limited means; the taxes are collected from them; they constitute the power of the country in every department of business and life, and in all respects of public policy their interests ought to be considered. The few who have money to lend can take care of themselves.

If we are to have a system of business which puts in the hands of private individuals, without the supervision of courts and of judges, the power of imposing upon this class of people the necessity of suing for the protection of their rights, we deprive them of all protection, for in nine cases out of ten this class of people are unable to go before the courts and to bear the expense of a suit; and public policy should be that the creditor, who has larger means and better opportunities to enforce his debt, should be the person required to go into court and ask the supervision and protection of the judicial power.

For myself, I gravely question whether or not it is in the competency of any statute to say that the judicial power shall not attach to the sale of property before it is made; that a contract between two individuals which gives one of them the power to sell the property of the other without any kind of sanction and without his consent, except given in the first instance in some obligation, is valid.

It is as old as the centuries, Mr. President, that there was in the olden time, in the beginning of English history and law until now, the practice of debtors in necessity to execute absolute deeds of conveyance to their creditors; and in the long line of English jurisprudence and in behalf of this same class of people it was held that these absolute deeds did not create a right to the property, although by their terms and the contract of the debtor they did so, but that the supervision and the decision of the judicial tribunal should be had before such a deed could vest a right and title to the property in anyone; and such ought to be the law of this District.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, in order to show how mistaken the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] is in his statement that this bill refers only to the form of deeds of conveyance and does not undertake to regulate sales under deeds of trust or mortgages with power of sale, I ask the Secretary to read from section 3, on page 3, commencing at line 21 with the word "unless," and going to the end of the section; and in order to make it understood, so much being left out, I will state that the preceding part of the bill provides for the investiture of the title in the grantee or trustee, and then proceeds in the way I desire to have read.

Mr. FAULKNER. I merely want to say to the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. GEORGE. Let the Secretary first read what I have indicated.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to say that I have not said that there was no provision as to that matter, but simply that this bill does not change the existing law, as I understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator insists upon his last statement being the correct one, if I misunderstood him in his answer to the Senator from Illinois, then I would say that his whole argument based upon the inopportuneness of the amendment falls to the ground, because there is a very large and long provision in the section which I have asked the Secretary to read, regulating the sale to be made by the trustee, prescribing the time, the place, the notice, and the application of the proceeds.

Mr. President, if in a bill of this sort, which provides these things with reference to sales made by trustees without legal proceedings, it is improper to incorporate a provision that such sales shall not be made at all, then we are confined always when bills are presented to us to the simple proposition of perfecting the very idea which is presented in the bill which may be before us and we can not reverse it. I say we can reverse it.

I now ask the Secretary to read, beginning in line 21, with the word "unless," as before stated, and before he commences, I wish to say, so that the reader may understand it, that the preceding part of the bill authorizes, when certain forms are complied with, the investiture of title in the trustee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Unless otherwise in the deed expressed, to fully authorize the trustee (or trustees, the survivor, or survivors, or substituted trustee or trustees) in case of default in the payment of the debt or interest or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the note, notes, bond, or bonds described or any extensions or renewal thereof, or of any sum or sums advanced by the party or parties secured on account of taxes or insurance when demanded when requested in writing by the beneficiary or his assigns under said deed to sell the land described, or such thereof as may be necessary, at public auction, in front of the premises, at such times, upon such terms, with such postponement or postponements of sale or resale, and after such previous advertisement, not less than ten days, in a daily newspaper or newspapers printed and published in said district, as to the trustee or trustees, or trustee acting, shall seem most for the interest of all parties concerned, and on compliance with the terms of sale to convey all the right, title, and interest held by the trustee to the purchaser or purchasers the property sold, discharged of the trusts and of all liability on the part of the purchaser or purchasers to see to or account for the application of the purchase money, and to apply the proceeds of the sale after retaining a trustee's commission on the gross amount thereof not exceeding 2 per cent thereof, as follows:

"First. To the payment of the expenses of sale and in discharging any prior liens or taxes on the land and premises.

"Second. To the payment of any sum or sums which may have been advanced by the holder or owner of the debt secured on account of insurance and taxes.

"Third. To the satisfaction of the debt secured by the trust remaining unpaid, with interest thereon as specified in the deed of trust, paying over the surplus, if any, to the grantor or grantors in the trust, his, her, or their heirs or assigns."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] to recommit the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions.

Mr. ALLISON. What are the instructions?

Mr. DOLPH. Let the instructions be stated.

Mr. ALLEN. The motion was to recommit the bill with instructions to so reform it as to require the foreclosure in a court of equity of trust deeds and mortgages before the right of the equitable holder can be extinguished; doing away with the system of advertisement and sale of the property of citizens who have been compelled to give a mortgage or deed of trust to secure deferred payments.

Mr. DOLPH. The idea is to prohibit the trustee doing that, is it not?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator does not wish to interfere with the conveyance. That is excluded, I understand?

Mr. ALLEN. No, trust deeds and mortgages are in law the same thing, if given as security for debt.

Mr. DOLPH. A deed of trust is executed by the trustee, while a mortgage is foreclosed by a court.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir. I have stated the substance of the instructions I propose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska to recommit the bill with the instructions suggested by him.

Mr. ALLEN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is necessarily absent; but before leaving the Chamber he informed me that he was opposed to the recommital of the bill, and asked me to secure a pair for him. I vote "nay," and I have asked the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to kindly pair with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ALLISON (after having voted in the affirmative). I do so with pleasure, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], and vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN.]

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I do not know how he would vote on this question. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], but I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT]. I do not know how he would vote on this question if he were present, and therefore I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. VILAS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. Is he recorded as voting?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. VILAS. Unless there is necessity for my vote to make a quorum I shall withhold it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. I observe that Senator is absent, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to say that my colleague [Mr. CAMDEN] is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to announce for the day that my colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON].

Mr. VILAS. Has a quorum voted, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. VILAS. Then I shall vote on the question to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. ALLISON. I shall take the liberty of voting to make a quorum, if the Senate will allow me.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—16.

Allen,	Cullom,	Kyle,	Platt,
Allison,	George,	Mills,	Roach,

So the motion to recommit with instructions was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the word "advertisement" in section 4, line 34, strike out all of the section down to and including the word "concerned" and insert in lieu thereof the following:

By publishing a notice of the time, place, and terms of the sale once each week in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia for eight successive weeks; and a certified copy of such notice shall be personally served on the person in actual occupancy of the real estate and the grantor of the trust deed, if he resides in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the Secretary read the part proposed to be stricken out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out after the word "advertisement," in line 34, the following words:

Not less than ten days, in a daily newspaper or newspapers printed and published in said District, as to the trustee or trustees, or trustee acting, shall seem most for the interest of all parties concerned.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have no objection to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Nebraska, and I hope it will be agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the section read as it will stand amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 4. That a deed of land in the District of Columbia in trust to secure the payment of debt in the following words, or to the like effect, namely:

This deed of trust made this [date], between [the grantor or grantors] of the first part, and [the trustee or trustees] of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party (or parties) of the first part, in consideration of the debt hereinafter specified doth (or do) convey unto the party (or parties) of the second part the following-described land in the [here insert location and description of the property] in trust to secure to [the party secured] payment of the sum of [amount] dollars, on account of [here state character of debt] and interest thereon, the said debt and interest being payable according to the tenor and effect of [here insert the number and description of the note or notes, bond or bond, etc.], with the power of sale authorized by law. Witness, the following signature (or signatures) and seal (or seals) shall be deemed legally sufficient in form to vest in the trustee (or trustees, the survivor or survivors) all the estate, right, title, and interest whatever, both at law and in equity, of the grantor in the land conveyed for the purposes of the trust, and, unless otherwise in the deed expressed, to fully authorize the trustee (or trustees, the survivor or survivors, or substituted trustee or trustees) in case of default in the payment of the debt or interest or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the note, notes, bond or bonds described or any extensions or renewal thereof, or of any sum or sums advanced by the party or parties secured on account of taxes or insurance when demanded when requested in writing by the beneficiary or his assigns under said deed to sell the land described, or such thereof as may be necessary, at public auction, in front of the premises, at such time, upon such terms, with such postponement or postponements of sale or resale, and after such previous advertisement, by publishing a notice of the time, place, and terms of the sale once each week in some daily newspaper published in the District of Columbia for eight successive weeks; and a certified copy of such notice shall be personally served on the person in actual occupancy of the real estate and the grantor of the trust deed, if he resides in the District of Columbia; and on compliance with the terms of sale to convey "all the right, title, and interest held by the trustee" to the purchaser or purchasers, the property sold, discharged of the trusts and of all liability on the part of the purchaser or purchasers to see to or account for the application of the purchase money, and to apply the proceeds of the sale after retaining a trustee's commission on the gross amount thereof not exceeding 2 per cent thereof, as follows:

"First. To the payment of the expenses of sale and in discharging any prior liens or taxes on the land and premises.

"Second. To the payment of any sum or sums which may have been advanced by the holder or owner of the debt secured on account of insurance and taxes.

"Third. To the satisfaction of the debt secured by the trust remaining unpaid, with interest thereon as specified in the deed of trust, paying over the surplus, if any, to the grantor or grantors in the trust, his, her, or their heirs or assigns."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that in line 2 of section 2, before the word "general," the word "with" be inserted; so as to read "with general warranty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. What has become of the amendment which was just read at the desk? I think the question has not been put on that amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska has been agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. No, it has not.

Mr. HARRIS. I thought the Senator from West Virginia accepted it.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from West Virginia is not the Senate

Mr. HARRIS. Of course not, but I understood the Chair to say, "If the Chair hears no objection the amendment is agreed to." I may be entirely mistaken about it.

Mr. HOAR. I listened very carefully.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will put the question. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. DOLPH. I have no particular objection to the amendment that I know of, but I think eight weeks' notice in a daily newspaper is a pretty long notice of sale.

Mr. ALLEN. It is only once a week.

Mr. FAULKNER. There is to be only one insertion each week.

Mr. DOLPH. One insertion each week?

Mr. FAULKNER. That is all.

Mr. DOLPH. I have no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that is a longer extension of time for notice than is required by the usual custom in the States, and I think it would be a radical change in the mode of dealing with real estate in this city. I shall be guided entirely by the wishes of the people here. It would be a very grave and serious embarrassment, I know, in the habits and customs of the people of Washington. Here the people treat real estate very much like personal property. They sell it on short notice—I believe on ten days' notice. Most of the trust deeds that have fallen under my observation required ten days' publication of the notice, and a personal notice added.

It seems to me that is sufficient. To require eight weeks, advertisement, a long delay of that kind, it appears to me is unnecessary. The bill as it stood, reported from the committee, meets my judgment more fully. I say I think an eight-weeks' notice would be a very serious embarrassment to the people of the District, who treat real estate very much as we do personal property. In the State of Ohio thirty days' notice is required, and that would seem to be long enough. Property there may be sold on thirty days' notice upon a trust deed, or it may be sold under the ordinary orders of a court upon notice of thirty days.

Mr. HUNTON. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me, although that period of time is provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, it does not preclude the parties from making any other provision.

Mr. ALLEN. I can not hear what the Senator from Virginia is saying.

Mr. HUNTON. When the parties meet together to negotiate a loan, secured by deed of trust, they may provide for ten or twenty or thirty days' notice. But in the absence of any such provision the amendment comes in.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senator from Nebraska whether the construction now put upon his amendment by the Senator from Virginia is correct, that if the deed of trust provides for only ten days' notice this requirement of eight weeks' notice will not be necessary? Is that the purport of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLEN. I was unable to hear what the Senator from Virginia said.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Virginia said that this is simply directory, and if the trust deed required the sale to be made after ten days' notice, it would supersede and take the place of this provision of the proposed law. Is that what the Senator from Nebraska understands?

Mr. ALLEN. No, sir; that is not at all my understanding of the provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not so understand it. I think that is a mandatory provision, that whatever may be the agreement of the parties as to the mode of sale, the time of notice, etc., there must be eight weeks' notice even where the trust deed requires only ten days' notice.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think the Senator from Ohio is clearly correct in that view. This is a purely statutory provision, and it provides the terms upon which the trustee can sell without going into a court of equity for the purpose of having a decree of sale. The terms of the proposed statute will beyond question control the trustee in execution of this power.

Mr. SHERMAN. I so consider it: and it seems to me therefore that it is unreasonable; that it is an interference with the contract of parties made in good faith and competent to deal with each other. I believe myself that the general tendency of public opinion not only in this country, but in all countries, is to provide for the easy, rapid, and sure disposition of real estate very much like personal estate.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Nebraska if it would be satisfactory to them to incorporate, instead of the notice proposed to be prescribed by statute, a provision to the effect that the contracting parties may fix in their contract the character and length of notice that shall be given before the sale.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that would be a wise provision, leaving the parties free to contract or to be contracted with. That is the general tendency and spirit of the times.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that satisfactory to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ALLEN. I regret very much that the Senator from Ohio was not in his seat when I discussed this question.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask the Senator from Nebraska to yield to me for a moment. I think there is no question that I was right in the position I took. I beg leave to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Nebraska to the language of the bill:

> And, unless otherwise in the deed expressed, to fully authorize the trustee (or trustees, the survivor or survivors, or substituted trustee or trustees) in case of default in the payment of the debt or interest or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the note, notes, bond, or bonds described or any extensions or renewal thereof, or of any sum or sums advanced by the party or parties secured on account of taxes or insurance when demanded, when requested in writing by the beneficiary or his assigns under said deed to sell the land described, or such thereof as may be necessary, at public auction in front of the premises at such times, upon such terms, with such postponement or postponements of sale or resale, and after such previous advertisement.

Then it prescribes the advertisement, but it is qualified all the way through by the expression "unless otherwise in the deed expressed." Therefore, when the parties to the contract agree upon other terms and express them in the deed, it qualifies this proposed law because the proposed law will only apply to cases where it is not otherwise expressed.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is the construction of the proposed law I am perfectly well satisfied that it shall stand.

Mr. HUNTON. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not the construction placed upon it by the Senator who offered the amendment, and there ought to be some clearness of expression on the subject before we act upon it.

Mr. ALLEN. My attention had not been called to the words of the bill as read by the Senator from Virginia. Of course with those words in the bill the construction of the Senator from Virginia is the correct one. I shall move, however, at the proper time, to strike out those words wherever they occur.

My purpose in offering the pending amendment is to give the debtors of obligations of this character some slight opportunity to prepare themselves to redeem their property before the title shall be absolutely extinguished. I submit to the Senator from Ohio in all candor that ten days' notice is not a sufficient length of time to enable the ordinary grantor in a deed of this kind to preserve himself from the injury that would come to him by the sale of his property. Certainly there can be no harm done by the adoption of an amendment of the kind I have proposed. It gives the debtor ample time to prepare himself to redeem his property. It gives him an opportunity to save his property, to save the money he has invested in the property, where is ten days to the average man means an absolute extinguishment of his title and a loss to him of every dollar he has put into the property.

In view of the fact that the grantee in the trust deed is constantly drawing interest upon his money up to the day of its payment and up to the day of the extinguishment of his title, what harm can there be to the creditor to give the debtor a sufficient length of time, say sixty days, which is very short, in which to prepare himself to meet his obligations?

I shall not argue this matter at any length at all, because it has all been gone over this afternoon. It is idle to say that ten days' notice is of any value whatever to the average man who is required to give a trust deed. The trust deed is exacted by the creditor, and he fixes the terms himself and not the debtor. The force of the circumstances surrounding the execution of the contract makes him the dictator of its terms. You might as well provide that the grantee in the trust deed can take possession of the property without any notice whatever, and without any right of redemption upon the part of the grantor, as to limit the notice to ten days.

It is for the purpose of answering in some measure the statutes which we have in this country authorizing a stay of execution and granting in some measure the equity power of fixing a time within which redemption may take place after a foreclosure has been ordered that this amendment is offered. It is merely to give the creditor a sufficient length of time to turn himself and save his property. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he sees anything wrong in that kind of business? It strikes me it is preëminently just. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I disagree with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON], and, as I understand him, with the Senator from Nebraska. The fourth section of the bill provides that a deed of trust made in the language therein set out or other similar language "shall be deemed legally sufficient in form to vest in the trustee all the estate, right, title, and interest whatever, both at law and in equity, of the grantor in the land conveyed for the purposes of the trust, and, unless otherwise in the deed expressed to fully authorize the trustee" to do what? To sell the land upon "default in the payment of the debt or interest or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the note, notes, bond, or bonds described or any extensions or renewals thereof, or of any sum or sums advanced by the party or parties secured on account of taxes or insurance when demanded when requested in writing by the beneficiary;" and it then provides that notice shall be given.

I think it would be quite competent for the grantor in a deed of trust to provide that the sale should not take place until ninety days after default, or that when notice was given, instead of ten days it should be thirty days or sixty days; but I do not think it would be competent for the parties to agree that the minimum notice required in the proposed law should be dispensed with, and that the sale might be had without notice or upon one day's notice, or upon ten days' notice. The provisions to be made in the deed of trust otherwise than these provisions for the sale, would be provisions extending the time, and in favor of the grantor, but the provisions for the sale are statutory provisions, which, in my judgment, can not be dispensed with by the parties.

Mr. President, I think ten days' notice in a newspaper published every day would be better than once a week for eight weeks. I think a notice in a newspaper published week days for thirty days or one month, or for four weeks, would be preferable to once a week for four weeks, although I am not particular about that provision.

I call the attention of the Senator from Nebraska while I am up to the fact that under the language of his amendment, if it should be adopted, it would be necessary to strike out the word "such" in line 33, in the phrase "after such previous advertisement not less than ten days." I think to make it read smoothly the word "such" ought to come out. Let the first part of the amendment be read to see if I am not correct. Let the Secretary commence after the word "resale," in line 33, with the words "and after such previous advertisement."

The Secretary read as follows:

And after such previous advertisement by publishing a notice of the time, place, and terms of the sale, etc.

Mr. DOLPH. The word "such" should be stricken out in the phrase "after such previous advertisement."

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I should not like to see the pending bill passed in the shape in which it has been reported to the Senate. In the first place, as I have already said, it is becoming more and more the policy of this country to give a little time, when it is necessary, before a man's real estate, his home it may be, shall be taken from him for debt. In my own State, and I find it is so in other States, it has become the policy that no trust deed shall be foreclosed except through proceedings in court, thereby giving time. But that course of procedure seems to have no friends in the Senate. The policy of the Senate seems to be to enact laws providing that when a man is called upon to borrow a few hundred dollars, and in order to secure it gives a note and a trust deed upon his property, he shall not go into court, he shall not have thirty days, he shall not have sixty days, but his home, in which his family is living, is to be sold on a ten days' notice. It seems to me, sir, it is cruel, and I am surprised that the generous-hearted Senator from West Virginia should bring a bill into the Senate which provides for that sort of proceeding in the District of Columbia in relation to the disposition of real estate.

Mr. FAULKNER. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CULLOM. I will.

Mr. FAULKNER. Why does not the Senator direct his remarks to the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], and not to the Senator from West Virginia when I have accepted an amendment providing for eight weeks' notice?

Mr. CULLOM. I am very much obliged to the Senator from West Virginia for giving me that information. I did not know he had accepted such an amendment, and I was directing my remarks to him because I understood he reported the bill and has been advocating the ten days' notice. The bill as reported contained that provision. I am very much gratified to know that the Senator from West Virginia has acceded to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. I must say to my friend, the distinguished Senator from Ohio, whose leadership I have been pleased to follow in nearly all instances, that I am surprised that he should insist upon this floor that ten days' notice is sufficient time in which to dispose of real estate under a trust deed.

Sir, there are hundreds of people in the District of Columbia to-day—probably they are employés of the Departments—who have bought little homes and paid out upon them a thousand or fifteen hundred dollars, more or less, and have nearly completed their payments. By some misfortune or accident, they are unable to meet their deferred payments promptly, and they are to be sold out and their families, their wives, and children turned out of doors on a ten days' notice of a foreclosure of a trust deed. It does seem to me that we ought not to hesitate an instant in requiring eight weeks' notice, if we do not provide that the mortgagor may go into court and have the court act upon the question of the foreclosure of the mortgage or trust deed. I do not care to discuss the matter longer, but I insist there should not, and hope there will not, be any opposition to a provision requiring a reasonable notice to the grantor of a trust deed before it can be foreclosed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. I now offer an amendment in the nature of a proviso to be added to section 4.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is propose to add to section 4 the following proviso:

Provided, That the grantor in the trust deed, his heirs or assigns, may redeem the trust property so sold at any time within one year after the sale by the payment of the principal and interest of the debt and all legal costs of such sale.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, in offering this amendment I am guided by the very humane homestead laws of the different States of the Union and the laws of the different States upon the subject of mortgages and trust deeds. I was very glad indeed to see the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] take the position he did with reference to the amendment I had the honor to submit a short time ago. This proviso and the amendment which has just been agreed to, are in the interest of justice to all classes, not justice alone to the debtor, but justice to the creditor.

The rule of equity was well stated by my distinguished friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] when he said that no difference what the form of the security might be, if it was simply to secure a loan of money it was in equity a mortgage, whether the form was an ordinary mortgage, a trust deed, or a deed of warranty with full covenant. When a man loans money upon real estate in the District and is permitted to foreclose his trust deed or his mortgage, or whatever he sees fit to call it, and gain possession of the property, it strikes me the ends of equity are subserved and his interests fully protected if the unfortunate debtor, who by reason of sickness or some other accident has been unable to meet his payment, is able within one year, to pay him the principal and interest and all the costs he has been put to in the foreclosure.

Let us take the case, for instance, of an humble man who buys property for which he promises to pay the sum of $3,000 we will say. He pays $2,000 in cash. He executes one of these trust deeds, which puts the keeping of his property in the hands of the grantee of that deed, with every provision drawn for the benefit of the grantee and not for the benefit of the grantor. He makes improvements upon this property, having invested in it 66⅔ per cent of its total value, and when the time comes for the payment of the deferred $1,000 through some circumstances over which he can exercise no control whatever, he is prevented from making the payment promptly. Under those circumstances, under the form of deed provided in the bill, he may be foreclosed upon immediately.

The grantee of the trust deed gets back the property, worth $3,000 and any appreciation in value that may have occurred in the meantime. He gets the $2,000 that the grantor has invested in the property. He gets the improvements made upon the property, and he turns out of doors the debtor and his family to become a public charge, when if the debtor were permitted some time to redeem his home, some slight time to get the money with which to make the redemption, he could pay the thousand dollars, the interest due upon it, the costs, and everything in law and in equity essential to satisfy the just demands of the creditor.

Why should this not be done? Should the Congress of the United States be less humane and less just than the Legislatures of the different States of the Union? There is scarcely a State in the Union where there is not a right of redemption after a decree of foreclosure; and where there are no statutes of that kind, courts of equity, State and national, throughout the Union make some provision in the decree of foreclosure by which the debtor is given time to procure the money to redeem and save his property.

I submit, Mr. President, that the people who are affected most in the District and who must be affected by the proposed law are the class of persons mentioned by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]. They are a class of poor persons who have invested every dollar they have in little homes and who depend upon their daily labor or their monthly labor for the means to pay off their indebtedness. If a man has put every dollar he has into his home it is just as sacred to him and his family as the home of the more fortunate man; and it should be the policy of Congress to encourage the security and integrity of the American home rather than to enact a law which destroys it and makes our poor people a class of tenants rather than freeholders.

If the right of redemption attaches, as it should (and it is simply in keeping with the different State statutes and the rules of courts of equity), whenever the creditor is paid his full sum of money with the interest contracted to be paid upon it and all costs up to the date of redemption, equity and justice are fully accomplished so far as he is concerned, and the creditor should have a right to save his home under those circumstances.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. VEST. I am compelled to leave the Senate Chamber on some committee business, and I ask the Senate to make the bill (S. 1462) to provide additional accommodations for the Government Printing Office the unfinished business, so that we can take it up to-morrow.

Mr. FAULKNER. After we have completed the consideration of the pending bill?

Mr. VEST. After we have completed the bill under consideration, of course. I have waited here for three hours. I ask the Senate to agree to take it up and make it the unfinished business.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Missouri makes the request with the qualification I suggest, that it shall not displace the pending bill if it is not finished this evening, I make no objection.

Mr. VEST. I do not wish to displace the bill which is pending.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

FORMS OF DEEDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 832) to simplify the form of deeds of conveyance, trust, and releases of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. FAULKNER. If I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, having the consideration of the bill in charge, I can not agree to its adoption. As I understand the Senator's amendment—I may have caught it wrong—after the sale is made under the provisions of the proposed statute and the purchaser has acquired a title by the conveyance from the trustee and has recorded that conveyance upon the records of the District as provided by law, then within a year after that period the grantor, his heirs or representatives, may come in and redeem it.

I can not see how that can be carried out without creating confusion to a very great extent, unless you go farther and make provisions as to a reconveyance from the purchaser and others back to the grantor in order to vest title, because under the system here, as in every State, the records of the recorder's office must be the absolute chain of perfected title. Therefore, if you allow the redemption and stop there that leaves the whole question of title up in the air, or, at least, vested by the records of the District in the purchaser at the trustee's sale.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question with his permission. Is the Senator from West Virginia willing to give any length of time for redemption after the sale of the property?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not think we ought to change the law of the District of Columbia as it has existed at least twenty or thirty years within my personal knowledge, in a matter in which the people of the District themselves are not asking for any change.

Mr. HARRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Nebraska whether, if you give the right of redemption, it will not necessarily cause the property to sell for a very much lower price than if no such right of redemption were secured?

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose, of course, that would be true.

Mr. HARRIS. And would not that be prejudicial to the debtor rather than to the creditor?

Mr. ALLEN. In answer to the Senator from Tennessee, I will state that I do not think it would be prejudicial to the interests of the debtor. While it might probably cause his property to sell for slightly less, all that would be made back by the right to the rental of the property during the time it was subject to redemption. There is no provision in the bill that the rental shall go to the debtor, but it would let the creditor himself take that.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I voted against recommitting the bill, but on a closer examination of the section under consideration I regret that I did so. Section 4 of the bill deals with muniments of title that are in substance and effect securities for the payment of money. In other words, it deals with those transactions and conveyances, which in legal contemplation, whatever form they may take in almost all the States where equity is administered, are mortgages. If it is an absolute deed, if it is intended as security for a debt, it is a mortgage. It seems that in the District of Columbia and in the State of West Virginia a different system prevails.

Mr. FAULKNER. And in Virginia and Maryland also.

Mr. DAVIS. Here a system prevails whereby a single transaction, showing the conveyance in the shape of a deed of trust to a third party, all the elements of a mortgage can be taken away from the transaction so far as foreclosure is concerned, even if in substance and effect it is a security for a debt. A man can be foreclosed on ten days' notice in a newspaper.

Mr. FAULKNER. In eight weeks.

Mr. DAVIS. Eight weeks—whatever the time fixed in the bill by amendment.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Minnesota pardon me for a suggestion?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Every element of the mortgage will be taken away.

Mr. DAVIS. I was about to come to that point.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will let me make a suggestion, I will state that a mortgage is a dead pledge; that is, where the creditor gets the property pledged, however valuable, to pay a debt however small. But this is a trust deed, where the property is sold by the agreement of the parties, and the creditor gets nothing but his debt. Whatever is left goes to the debtor. So it is not a mortgage. It is a popular misnomer to call it a mortgage.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a mortgage in the sense that it is a conveyance of real estate as security for the payment of a debt, and that in the almost universal applications of equity, is a mortgage, no matter what shape the conveyance may take.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me for another suggestion?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. It is not a conveyance of real estate as security, it seems to me, with great respect to the Senator's statement. It is a provision for the sale of the property to raise the money and pay a debt. That is a very different thing.

Mr. DAVIS. No, the debt passes as a consideration for the conveyance. Section 4 provides—

That a deed of land in the District of Columbia in trust to secure the payment of debt in the following words:

A deed of conveyance "to secure the payment of debt in the following words" I call a deed of trust, and in my contemplation in fact and substance it ought to be a mortgage. Now, under the general principles of equity jurisprudence a document of that kind, or a document of any kind, in whatever form it may be couched, is a mortgage. It must be foreclosed. The operations of equity jurisprudence must in some shape be brought to bear upon it with the accompanying or consequent privileges and rights of redemption.

The bill studiously avoids that consequence by an amendment of line 10 on page 3, for it provides that it shall vest in the trustee all the estate, right, title, and interest whatever, both at law and in equity, of the grantor, thus conveying the equity of redemption. Now, for all time the courts of equity have been contending and fighting against the application of the severe principle that a title of this kind shall become absolute on default, until it has become firmly embedded in the principles of equity jurisprudence that a title pledged as security for a debt can not become absolute and ought not to become absolute on account of the power of the creditor over the debtor and the necessity of the needy when pressed for money until a foreclosure of some kind is had whereby the equity of redemption can be extinguished.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota a question.

Mr. DAVIS. Excuse me just a minute. There are two methods whereby the effects of that great and beneficent principle are secured to the debtor. One is by the chancery foreclosure, with which we of the profession are all familiar. In many States of the Union, especially in the Northwest, we have in a more liberal degree a mode of proceeding somewhat analogous to that proposed here. A mortgage is given containing a power of sale like this. It is given directly to the mortgagee instead of a trustee by intervention. Under a power of sale of that character in most of the States of the Northwest that equity of redemption can be foreclosed by advertisement for six successive weeks in some newspaper, the sale to be made by the sheriff, the mortgagee or the trustee, for it applies to both in those parts of the country, having the power to bid. That is the law. A certificate of sale is given upon that bid. It is recorded. The mortgagor has one year in which to redeem by depositing the money with the sheriff, which strikes off the property. It strikes me that that is a much more enlightened, beneficent, and humane system, more in accordance with the general principles of the law of mortgages. People sometimes have to mortgage their homesteads, and when times become unfortunate, under this bill it is a short shrift, and under the general law in this District already it is ashort shrift.

Mr. FAULKNER. This bill does not change the existing law at all. It has existed always.

Mr. DAVIS. I say there should be a change. I say the law of this District, if it is as it is stated to be, ought to be modified in such a way that a loan of money upon real-estate security evidenced by a conveyance of the property, either absolute upon its face or conditional, in guise of a mortgage or anything else, ought to have indelibly engraved upon it the characteristics of a mortgage with all the rights of equity of redemption before default and a certain proper and reasonable period of redemption after sale.

Mr. FAULKNER. Before, but not afterwards.

Mr. DAVIS. It ought to be afterwards, just as in case of an ordinary court. This is all I want to say upon the matter. My attention had not been directed to this section before when I voted against the motion to recommit.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have great respect for the Senators who have discussed this question, and great respect for the motives which have prompted them. They are motives of kindness, liberality, and generosity. But I think they overlook the fundamental principle which lies at the bottom of this question and they overlook also the experience of the most enlightened and progressive communities in regard to it.

The amendment as advocated by its mover and by other Senators, strikes down and renders impossible two things. It renders impossible the loan of money on real-estate security with any certainty or security that it shall be paid at the day stipulated; so that no person engaged in business, no person having investments or situated so that he must in his turn depend upon his capacity to make punctual payments himself, can lend money to men in difficulties hereafter on real-estate security. Second, savings banks, which are the great lenders of money on real-estate security, which ought to be encouraged everywhere, and which are a sign of the highest prosperity (we have $370,000,000 invested in them by our workmen in my own State), can not make real-estate investments, because they must have their deposits, from the nature of their business, payable at once whenever there is a run, or a demand, or a hard time.

Now, what is the result of striking down that power? The result is that the man in difficulties, the debtor whom my humane and wise friend wishes to protect, instead of borrowing money when he is in trouble and in times of distress and hardship, when his property is to be taken on execution, instead of being able to borrow money on one, two, three years, or any length of time in the future on his real estate security, has got to sell it at a sacrifice; so that, in times of hardship and distress among the poor people, instead of having hundreds and thousands of mortgages to be paid in the future, the history hereafter is to be that there are to be hundreds and thousands of sales without redemption, at such terms as the buyer with the money in his pocket imposes upon the distressed seller.

In order to meet that, this provision has grown up, and it is not complained of anywhere. It has been the law of Massachusetts for thirty-two years, and you could not find a man, debtor or creditor, to raise his finger to ask any modification of it.

The object is that there may be a conveyance by which, at a time fixed in the future, ten months, one year, or five years, if the debt in the meantime has not been paid, there may be a sale under such stipulations and securities for full advertisement as the parties shall agree upon, the debt only being paid over to the creditor, and the balance going back to the debtor, the grantor or his assigns. Now, that is not a mortgage. It has the name of mortgage in our public nomenclature, because it is a provision usually inserted in a mortgage; that is, there is an old-fashioned mortgage with its three years' foreclosure, or its foreclosure by judicial sale, or at the election of the creditor.

This trust is treated as a trust deed, and the sale is made. The one especial difference between a mortgage and a trust deed or a deed of this kind is that a mortgage is the dead pledge, mort gage; that is, the property, however valuable or large, if the debt is not paid, goes to the creditor to extinguish the debt, however small, and the debtor has no further interest in it. That is the dead hand, the dead gage, the dead pledge on the man's property, but when the property is sold and there are such arrangements as the parties can agree upon, the creditor never gets anything but his debt. He does not get the property unless there is a special provision that he may buy, which is not found in the customs of this District; it is not found in this bill. He gets only his debt, and the debtor, or his grantee, gets the rest.

Mr. President, I affirm as a matter of experience that it is a bad thing for debtors, that it is a bad thing for debtors in distress, that it is a bad thing for poor householders to deprive them of the right in times of distress to make the contract which is proposed. Always the courts of equity prevent hardship. If there is a time where a ten days' sale is too short, a simple petition to the court will create a stay, and the thing will be done under the humane care and direction of the court. It is very well, of course, that the law should require ample publicity in the notice, that if you do not want to trust the parties to put it in their deeds there should be a provision that the notice should be in well-known newspapers, or in newspapers every day for two or three weeks, and a notice put upon the premises and a public sale in the business hours of the day—all those things, even a sale by a public officer.

There is no harm in that; there is no objection to that; but to do what is proposed by this amendment is simply to say, I repeat, to every debtor in distress, "You have got to sell out your property in the time of your distress, and you shall not have it in your power to make the best security of it for a payment in the future when you are not in distress." It is to say to the great savings-bank system, which is beneficent, not only because it enables and encourages men to make little deposits of money which are managed for their benefit, but also to enable the savings banks to encourage their depositors and customers in getting little homesteads by loans of small amounts on real estate; "You shall not hereafter, if you observe the principles of sound banking, make your investments in the shape of loans upon real estate."

Mr. GRAY. And to loan associations.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, to loan associations, and building associations, and all such humane enterprises. There lies at the bottom of the solvency, of the success, of the lawfulness of every one of these institutions the fact that its investments shall be so made that in the time of a run it can not be swamped, and that the poor widow, or the poor workingman out of employ, who has his little hoard, shall have it without having to wait six, nine, or twelve months, until all the real-estate investments which the bank had can get sold under onerous provisions after six or twelve months' notice.

Now, that is the whole of this matter. I argued this question in the Legislature of Massachusetts in the year 1852, when there was against this view a storm of prejudice, an ignorant, though most humane and kind-hearted prejudice. It carried the Legislature, and they refused to prohibit this class of contracts; and it has been one of the most beneficent habits and customs that ever existed. I do not wish to speak boastfully, but I have the right to say that the experience of that Commonwealth, with its $370,000,000 of deposits of its working people and their widows and orphans in those institutions, with only two or three instances of savings banks that have failed, is worth studying.

Mr. PEFFER. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. In one moment. Just let me finish my statement. Now, here is a community in the District of Columbia—and I understand there has not been one lisp of a desire from this people here to have this policy forced upon them. It is the theory of a most worthy and excellent gentleman who lives 1,500 miles off that is proposed to be put upon them. Now I will answer the Senator's question.

Mr. PEFFER. I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts, in view of his encomium upon the beneficence of the mortgage and trust deed system, whether it is a fact that the number of renters, the number of people who rent the houses they live in, has not greatly increased in proportion to the total number of population during the time to which the Senator refers?

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; I do not think the number has greatly increased. The number of people who own their houses is greater in that community than anywhere else I know of.

Mr. PEFFER. Does not the Senator know that the late census reports of the United States show that in Boston and in all the large cities of the country everywhere, without exception, the number of renters in proportion to the population has very greatly increased during the last ten years?

Mr. HOAR. I do not know that.

Mr. PEFFER. It is a fact, I will state to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. That does not answer the proposition. I thought the Senator was asking about the entire Commonwealth of Massachusetts; but undoubtedly that is very likely to be true. A nation, a starving nation, has moved across the Atlantic within a generation. People have come from the bogs of Ireland, from Germany and Belgium, from Russia and Armenia, where they barely earn the necessaries of life, and have become useful citizens, skillful mechanics, patriotic Americans, living in comfort and happiness. The man who, in Sheffield, lived on a bare floor and had his meat once a month perhaps for his family, living on a sixpence or a shilling a day, has his carpet and his sewing machine, and his daughter at school, and his piano. Of course, that has been the result of the great manufacturing system which has prevailed in this country, making us the foremost manufacturing nation on the face of the earth. Of course, in manufacturing communities, where a man perhaps will stay but a year or two at one place, the practice of renting rather than owning real estate will prevail to a large extent. The operative in Boston, the operative in our great cities, rents because it is to his advantage to rent.

Mr. GRAY. Rather than own.

Mr. HOAR. Rather than own; but the number of real estate owners who own their houses and invest their savings has also enormously increased at the same time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to remind the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts of the fact that, so far as New England is concerned, and especially in our manufacturing communities, we have had a great influx from Lower Canada of people who are honest and industrious and economical, but who nevertheless can not own their homes.

Mr. HOAR. Yes, who mean to go back; when they own their homes they mean to go back and buy them in Canada. That is very true.

Mr. GALLINGER. That explains to a considerable extent the fact to which the Senator from Kansas calls attention.

Mr. HOAR. I had a very curious experience three or four months ago when I was at home between the extra session and the regular session of Congress. A man who was in the habit of working in my garden had the ways and appearance and dress of an Irishman, and himself came over from Ireland. I had occasion to go after him in a hurry, and I found out where he lived. He had been working there as a common laborer for several years. I went to the house, and when the door was opened and I looked into the front entry of that man's house where he lived, it was as handsome an apartment as anybody would wish to see. There is not a member on this floor who would have been ashamed to have had his own front door opened and a guest look in upon that apartment, and its furniture, and its wall paper, and its carpet, and its neatly painted staircase.

Now, to go back, this is a question which very seriously is to affect the welfare of the class of people whose welfare above all the earth we are bound to look after. The capitalist and the merchant and the business man will take care of himself pretty well. I respect thoroughly the motive which has inspired the Senators who have undertaken to improve the bill, but I say again it is not wise, especially is it not wise in the absence of a lisp of a public desire, to take away from the workingman and the poor man, the wage-earner, the right to give security upon his property when he is in a hard place and compel him to part with it altogether at a sacrifice whenever he is in a hard place, which this policy will do. In the next place, it is wise to take away from the administration of the savings bank and the loan fund and the building association and the other kindred associations the power of so making their investments on real estate security that they can not protect themselves against a run.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. In what respect does this destroy or take away the right of the poor man the Senator mentions from making a contract for his own benefit, and in fact for the benefit of both parties? In what respect does it interfere with the freedom of contract?

Mr. HOAR. In the respect which I thought I had sufficiently and completely explained. He can not borrow money of a man whom he can not secure upon the only property he has, his real estate, with certainty that he will pay it at the time stipulated; and therefore no man and no institution who has to depend upon payment at the time stipulated will loan to him, and he has either to go to the usurer, who increases his rate of interest in consequence of this increased risk, or he has to be sold out altogether.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Massachusetts will permit me to suggest that under the amendment offered by me the debtor before he can get back his home is required to pay the principal, the interest, and all accrued costs, and when the creditor contracts with him, he understands that he is completely indemnified by the payment of the principal, the interest, and the costs, and he loses nothing.

Mr. HOAR. That reminds me of what I perhaps omitted to say, that there is not the slightest reason in the world why the fullest and amplest superintending and control of this matter should not be lodged in the courts to prevent the trustee from imposing on the debtor.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to ask him a question, as I did not quite understand the Senator?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Does the amendment of the Senator refer only to the state of things in which the mortgagee himself is the purchaser?

Mr. ALLEN. Oh, no, sir; it extends to all purchasers.

Mr. GRAY. I am not familiar with such a state of the law as the Senator describes, although I know it is common in some of the States, but would not the fact that the right of redemption exists limit the class of bidders upon such property and interfere very much with the price which is possible to be obtained for the mortgaged premises when they are put up for sale?

Mr. ALLEN. In answer to the Senator from Delaware, I will state that in the State where I live, where the rule is that prescribed in the amendment, the experience is that it does not interfere at all with the price of property. A man who makes a loan of money understands well when he is making it, and the purchaser understands well when he purchases it at the mortgage sale, he usually being the mortgagee.

Mr. GRAY. He is not usually the mortgagee with us.

Mr. ALLEN. He understands when he makes the loan and everybody understands that the mortgagor has a year's redemption. Therefore it prevents the mortgagee from overloaning on property, which is beneficial to both parties. The mortgagee takes into account the fact that the mortgagor has a year's right of redemption. When the decree of foreclosure is made, he may stay it by bond in some States, or request in others, or he may absolutely stay it by suit in still others. All persons understand that the right of redemption is absolute in some States up to nine months, and a year in others; and the purchaser, whether he is the mortgagee or some third person, understands that before property can be redeemed, the principal with the interest up to that date, and all costs, must be paid.

Mr. GRAY. I understand, if the Senator will allow me, that he seems to admit that the very fact that a law such as his amendment proposes exists, does affect the competition for the property when it is put up for sale, because the very fact which he states to be the fact, that all persons understand that this right of redemption exists in the mortgagor for the period the Senator has stated, will exclude some bidders, and it seems to me does affect the price which will ultimately be realized for the mortgaged premises.

Mr. ALLEN. That is not the effect of it, that is not the history of it.

Mr. GRAY. It is not in this part of the country as usual a thing as it may be in the West for the mortgagee to be the purchaser at the sale. Where property brings its value, it is more apt to be purchased by some outside or third person.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GRAY. Yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask whether in his State or in any State he knows of, or in any place in the United States except the District of Columbia, a piece of property can be sold absolutely that is mortgaged or conveyed in trust on ten days' notice, without any right of redemption thereafter to the debtor?

Mr. GRAY. I know of no such condition anywhere.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator what is the time in Delaware?

Mr. GRAY. We have no trust sale; but in proceedings for foreclosure the notice requisite for the sale would involve a period of six months.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. CHANDLER. One moment. Neither in Massachusetts, nor in any State of the Union that I know of, is there such a strict foreclosure sale as in this District, where you can advertise on the request of the creditor if even the interest on the debt is unpaid, and on ten days' notice sell the property without any right of redemption whatever.

Mr. FAULKNER. That is the law in West Virginia, in Virginia, and in Maryland, surrounding this District, and after an advertisement of thirty days, I think it is. There is no redemption under a trust sale in any of those States.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very good. I am speaking of the ten days' notice. The Senator from Massachusetts talks about a court of equity interfering. A court of equity can not interfere if the terms of the trust deed are literally complied with, and the terms are that if any portion of the debt, either principal or interest, is unpaid and the creditor wants to sell on ten days' notice, there must be a sale. There is absolutely no time given to the debtor unless fraud or mistake or accident is shown.

Mr. HOAR. My friend does not state the law of the jurisdiction with which he is acquainted and he does not state the law of the jurisdiction with which I am acquainted.

Mr. CHANDLER. I state the law of jurisdictions with which I am acquainted, one the law of New Hampshire, where it takes a year, the law of Massachusetts, where it takes a year, and the law of this District, where it takes but ten days.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator's statement, to which I called his attention, was that it would not interfere where the terms of the trust deed were complied with. That is not at all true. The very thing that equity is made for is to interfere where a contract is unconscionable or where by the particular circumstances of the contract it is inequitable in its initiation.

Mr. CHANDLER. It would not interfere against this proposed act of Congress, which says that where any part of the debt or interest is not paid, on the request of the creditor, the land may be sold in ten days. Will a court of equity interfere in that case?

Mr. HOAR. In Massachusetts it is thirty days.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 19, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MILITARY PRISON, FORT LEAVENWORTH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter transmitting an estimate of deficiencies in the appropriation for the support of the military prison at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., submitted by the Secretary of War; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. O'NEIL, for two days.

To Mr. HEINER of Pennsylvania, for three weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. ARNOLD (on motion of Mr. CLARK of Missouri), for two weeks on account of important business.

To Mr. COOMBS, for Tuesday and Wednesday, on account of public business.

COMMODORE O. C. BADGER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (S. 943) for the relief of Commodore Oscar C. Badger.

Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill lie on the Speaker's table for the present.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CLAIMS OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST TENNESSEE, AND OF TENNESSEE AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (S. 61) for the adjustment of certain claims of the United States against the State of Tennessee, and of certain claims of the State of Tennessee against the United States.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that joint resolution.

Mr. SAYERS. I must object, Mr. Speaker. I want to go on with the pending appropriation bill, and I will ask the gentleman to let that lie over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. The joint resolution will lie upon the Speaker's table if there be no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Has it been referred to a committee?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. DINGLEY. Does the gentleman desire it to lie on the table, it not having been referred to a committee of the House?

The SPEAKER. If objection is made, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

SITE FOR A NEW GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill (H. R. 53) immediately after the pending appropriation bill has been disposed of. This is a House bill authorizing the purchase of certain real estate for the erection of a Government Printing Office.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the gentleman's request is for unanimous consent to consider the bill indicated by him after the sundry civil bill. I object for the present. It will be time enough to agree to that request after the pending bill is disposed of.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. There is no call of committees this morning.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. LESTER of Georgia in the chair).

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon the pending paragraph and amendments be closed at 2 o'clock, the time to be equally divided between those who favor the pending amendments and those who are opposed to them.

Mr. HARTMAN. I understand that the gentleman from Texas has no objection to thirty minutes being accorded to those who are in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not object to that.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there are gentlemen on this side who desire to consume some little time in the discussion of matters relating to the Missouri Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the paragraph to which the request of the gentleman from Texas relates.

Mr. LOUD (to Mr. SAYERS). Say a quarter past 2 o'clock instead of 2.

Mr. SAYERS. I think we can close at 2 o'clock and have time enough for debate. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that all debate upon the pending paragraph of the bill and amendments be closed at 2 o'clock; the time to be equally divided.

Mr. PICKLER. That will permit us to offer such amendments as we desire?

Mr. SAYERS. You can offer them, but without debate.

Mr. PICKLER. We want time to present them.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Does this relate to the Soldiers' Home matter?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir; to the Missouri Commission.

Mr. MERCER. Then I misunderstood the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. HERMANN. Not only to the Missouri River Commission, but to the other contracts.

Mr. SAYERS. There are no other contracts involved at all; nothing but the Missouri River Commission.

Mr. HERMANN. Then the gentleman does not include in his request the general contract system?

Mr. SAYERS. No; that has nothing to do with it.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Do I understand that a portion of the time will be given to the amendment in relation to the Soldiers' Home?

Mr. SAYERS. No; there will be additional time for that.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman from Texas to permit me to make some remarks on a paragraph that has been passed.

Mr. SAYERS. I will give the gentleman time before we close the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am ready to assent to anything that is satisfactory to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL].

Mr. COGSWELL. I do not understand what the pending proposition is.

Mr. SAYERS. I have asked unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments be closed at 2 o'clock; the time to be divided equally between the friends and the opponents of the amendments.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Say at 2:15. That will give an hour to each side.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, we have several amendments that we desire to present. The Chair will remember that I wished to present one the other day, but let it go over. Now, it might be that all this time would be consumed by the friends of one amendment. I want only a short time, but I do want time to offer these amendments.

Mr. SAYERS. There will be an hour to be divided, and if I am allowed to regulate it I will try to distribute the time fairly.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not want more than ten minutes.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I want five.

Mr. COGSWELL. Will the gentleman from Texas modify his request so as to have the debate close at half past 2?

Mr. SAYERS. Let it be half past 2, then, Mr. Chairman.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. SAYERS. I suggest that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] be allowed to control the time of those opposed to the amendments, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] be allowed to control the time of those in favor either of the pending amendments or amendments that may be proposed

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to that arrangement? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, when we had this matter under discussion on Friday last, I undertook to give what the Committee on Rivers and Harbors considered sound and substantial reasons why certain of the great works of river and harbor improvement had been placed under what is called the contract system. It has been complained that one effect of that system has been to discriminate against other projects. Measurably that is necessarily true; and it was perfectly understood when Congress embarked upon this system that that effect would necessarily, to some extent, result. For instance, Mr. Chairman, it was understood then that those works which were placed under the contract system would receive appropriations at the short session of each Congress until they were completed—a benefit which could not come and which never did come to those works not embraced in that system.

Now, it surely can not be argued that because these contract works receive an appropriation at the short session, any harm whatever has been done to other works, because prior to the adoption of this contract system there was no river and harbor appropriation whatever at a short session of Congress.

But the system was entered into because it was believed, and experience has manifested that that belief was well founded, that the system would result in very great economy to the Federal Treasury and would greatly expedite the completion of these works so important to the commerce of our great country. And the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, following the precedent, I will say, set by the Senate in 1890, embraced in their river and harbor bill for 1892 twelve additional projects which I named during my remarks on Friday last. And while it is a fact that there can not be anything local or sectional with reference to any one of these great works, yet it is also true that while embarking upon a system which we believed would result in great benefit, we did endeavor, even locally speaking, to fairly distribute the works which were to be put under that system.

For instance, we included, as I stated, Point Judith, Rhode Island; the Hudson River, New York; Hay Lake and St. Marys channels, in the Great Lakes; the harbor of Philadelphia; the Missouri River in the West; the Upper Mississippi in the West; Galveston in the South; Charleston, Savannah, Mobile, and the Lower Mississippi; St. Johns, Florida; the Great Kanawha, West Virginia; Humboldt, California; the Cascades, Oregon; Baltimore, Md.; and the ship channel running through the Great Lakes from end to end. So that the action of the committee can not be subjected to criticism even if these works were to be regarded as local.

But take, for instance, in confirmation of my statement that you can not localize one of these great works, the case of the harbor at Galveston. That harbor, Mr. Chairman, was placed under the contract system, not for the purpose of complying with the wishes of the people of the State of Texas, but for the purpose of gratifying the desires of the Representatives on this floor from the great States of the West, such as Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and other States in that vicinage. They were extremely anxious that they should find a shorter route to the seaboard: and it is said to be a fact that they do reach the seaboard by a distance of 700 miles at Galveston or at Sabine Pass. That work was expedited at the urgent request and demand of gentlemen representing those States, and not at all at the instance of the people of Texas.

Take, again, the work for the improvement of the mouth of the Mississippi River by jetties, which was completed, fortunately, some years ago. That was not done for the purpose of pleasing the people of the State of Louisiana, but for the purpose of giving facilities for the enormous foreign commerce of that city. I hold in my hand a statement made by Mr. Warmouth, the collector of commerce at the city of New Orleans, showing that during the last twelve months, notwithstanding the great depression which prevailed in business all over this country, the exports and imports of that city have reached the gigantic sum in value of $109,000,000. So that that was a national work. It was meant to accommodate the world's commerce as well as the coastwise commerce of this country.

So, if you take the work on the Mississippi River, nobody can say that there is anything local in the character of that work. It appears that the through freight alone on that great river during the past twelve months amounted to 8,604,663 tons. It appears from a statement of the Pittsburg Coal Exchange that 46,250,000 bushels of coal alone went down that river from the city of Pittsburg. It appears also that the receipts at the city of New Orleans by river (having no connection whatever with its foreign trade) reached the enormous sum of $40,000,000.

The same statement made by Collector Warmouth gives the commerce of a number of towns on the lower part of that river; and I regret that it is not in my power to give to this House a statement of the commerce of all the towns on that river. But, beginning as low down as Natchez, you will be surprised at the enormous amount of commerce transacted on that great stream. Take the town of Natchez—its river commerce was valued at $2,637,000; at the town of Vidalia it was $468,000; at Bayou Sara it was $586,429; at Baton Rouge it was $4,084,594; at Plaquemine it was $1,860,037; at Donaldsonville it was $4,613,321; at Red River it was $4,169,647. The river commerce from these sources alone, it will be seen, amounted to $18,419,888.

This does not at all take into account the enormous business transacted by the great city of Memphis, by the cities of Vicksburg and Helena, Greenville and Cairo, and numbers of other important places which I can mention.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the most earnest demand for the improvement of that river which was ever presented to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors came from the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York. A large delegation of those gentlemen came before us in 1892. Now, I will read you what the Chamber of Commerce is, as described by its own president. I clipped this from the New York Press of yesterday:

Mr. Charles S. Smith, president of the Chamber of Commerce, said:

"The Chamber of Commerce has 1,000 members, who are the largest individual taxpayers in the city of New York. The membership of the chamber comprises all of the avenues of commercial activity. Of the sixty-five banks which compose the New York Clearing House Association, sixty-one are members of the Chamber of Commerce. All the great life insurance companies, all the great railroad corporations, all the shipping merchants, bankers, and leading business men are members of the chamber. If anybody has a right to speak for the commercial interests of the metropolis, that body is the Chamber of Commerce. It is the oldest institution of the kind in the United States, its birth antedating that of the Republic. It is in no sense political."

I wish to repeat that the body so accurately defined by Mr. Smith, the president of that Chamber of Commerce, came before us and urged by every means in their power most liberal appropriations for the improvement of this great river.

Those persons who dwell on the banks of that river are really those least concerned in the maintenance of those levees. The Mississippi Valley will average 50 or 60 miles in width. Every foot of it is subject to overflow, unless prevented by means of these levees. There are great railroads traversing that whole valley, running north and south, east and west, speeding the Government's mails and the nation's commerce, and those great railroads are owned in the city of New York. Hence you can well understand the interest and anxiety which those people had in the maintenance of these levees, which are an essential feature of the system suggested by the Commission for the improvement of that river.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it can not certainly be said that there is anything local in the work of improving that great river from Cairo to the Gulf, a distance of eleven hundred miles. My friend, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON], made a statement here that since the foundation of the Government something like $75,000,000 had been expended on the Mississippi River. I don ot wish to dispute his figures. I have never myself seen the statement as to the amount that has been expended on that river, beginning with the foundation of the Government, but I do know that up to 1882 there had never been any substantial and systematic effort made to improve that River. And beginning with 1882 the total appropriations, as stated in the last annual report of the Mississippi River Commission, have been $19,987,335. Of that, less than one-third has been expended in the building of levees along the banks of that River. I will add, Mr. Chairman, that for every dollar that the Government has put into levees the people owning lands along the banks of that river have put in four or five, so that what the Government has done has simply been to aid these people to complete work which they had in hand, and which they themselves would have completed in the course of time.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman repeat his figures as to the amount expended since 1882?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have the exact figures as taken from the report of the Mississippi River Commission. From Cairo to the Gulf the amount expended has been $19,987,335.

Mr. LOUD. You do not include the whole river?

Mr. CATCHINGS. No, sir. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that the Mississippi River Commission is not a body of Southern men. There is but one man from the South on that Commission, and that is Maj. Harrod, a very distinguished engineer in civil life, residing in the city of New Orleans. Gen. Comstock is its president, and it is composod entirely of army officers, except three civilians, one of whom is Maj. Harrod, whom I have mentioned, another of whom is my distinguished friend, Judge Taylor, of Indiana, and another is Mr. Whiting, a member of the Coast and Geodetic Survey. Now, this Commission has constantly insisted that there could be no perfect improvement of that river which did not include restraint of the great floods which pour down in times of high water; and there is a reason for it, because if you were to flood that valley, as you will do if you throw down the levees, it is utterly impossible that there could be any commerce on that river.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. What is the amount of the salaries, if any, that are paid to the members of this Commission?

Mr. CATCHINGS. The civilian members get $3,000, the army men get nothing.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Does the gentleman think, or is it his opinion, that we could dispense with the civilians, and put on a commission composed entirely of army officers? The point I make is, that if it is advisable and in the interest of economy to detail army officers as Indian agents, why is it not in the interest of economy to place them on these Missouri and Mississippi River Commissions?

Mr. CATCHINGS. If this Commission, Mr. Chairman, was to be originally created, I should not have the slightest objection to having it composed entirely of officers of the Army; but the two civilian members, Judge Taylor, of Indiana, and Maj. Harrod, have been on the Commission for a great many years. They are men of distinguished ability, they are perfectly familiar with this work, and I do not think it would be the part of prudence now to take those men from the Commission; and yet I am quite prepared to admit that if the Commission were to be originated, I can see no reason why it should not be entirely composed of officers of the Army.

But, Mr. Chairman, you can have no navigation upon the Mississippi River in times of high water with that valley flooded. Why, it would be almost as dangerous for a heavily laden steamer to leave St. Louis for New Orleans with that valley flooded as it would be to start across the Atlantic Ocean.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. Will you please state in that connection the proportion of that $19,000,000 expended between Cairo and the mouth of the river since 1882 on levees?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I will give it to you exactly, $6,090,940.64; less than one-third of the appropriation.

Mr. MARSH. I just wanted it to appear in your remarks.

Mr. CATCHINGS. But, Mr. Chairman, there is an incidental benefit which is also a commercial benefit. It has enabled, as I have stated, the building and operation of great through lines of railroads all through the Mississippi Valley, which would be absolutely inhibited if you should not restrain these high waters. So that, if the incidental benefit is great, it is simply an additional reason why the Government should pursue that work.

Mr. PICKLER. Right there, if the gentleman pleases. So far as it affects the rivers and towns along the Mississippi River, if the waters encroach upon the town and the river becomes shallow, so that there is no harbor, is it not to the public benefit to protect that town as well as to secure the harbor?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Beyond any doubt.

Mr. PICKLER. Is it not a good thing for the people and for the country not to hold the commission or the committee here down to too close a distinction between what is incidental benefit and what is legitimate benefit?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, I would say this to my friend, that if you take a river like the Mississippi River, which has an enormous commerce, undoubtedly it is most desirable that you should make the harbors of that river safe and secure, because you can not fairly transact you commercial business unless you do.

The distinction we make between this river and the Missouri is that as the Missouri stands to-day it has no commerce. There is no commerce, or very little, on the Missouri River.

Mr. PICKLER. But it is just as necessary that we have it kept open for commerce.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I hope so. But I want to say this, that this committee has been endeavoring to improve the Missouri River so that you would have commerce, and we have endeavored to make liberal appropriations, and we have done so, as my friend knows, for the purpose of improving that river so that you could have commerce on it; but the unfortunate part was that, yielding to the requests of gentlemen representing districts along the banks, we have diverted the funds which were intended to be used in improving the navigation of that river for the protection of towns on its banks, where there is no river commerce.

Mr. PICKLER. Above Sioux City, the part in which I am interested, no appropriations have been used for that purpose.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I do not allude to your part of the river. I was speaking about the river from Sioux City down.

Mr. Chairman, what I have said has not been for the purpose of favoring the Mississippi River, or any other project, but in pursuance of my statement that it is in no sense a local work. For instance, St. Louis, Pittsburg, and Cincinnati ship vast quantities of freight down the Mississippi River. You can not take your stand on the banks of the river anywhere for half an hour without seeing the smoke of some steamer come into sight laden with products going down the Mississippi River. The Barge Line of the Mississippi Transportation Company of St. Louis alone shipped 392,670 tons of freight in the last year.

Take the Hudson River, I am sure I need not call attention to the national character of that stream. Take the harbors of Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile; the Old Dominion line of steamers touch and trade at each one of these ports; vessels engaged in foreign commerce enter and depart; the city of Savannah is one of the largest ports for naval supplies in America. So it will be found that every project that we have placed under this contract system can be fairly considered as a national rather than as a local or sectional project. But we hope to get rid of those that we have now in process of construction within a very short time, and then I trust the results will be found to be so satisfactory that the next Congress will not hesitate to take on twelve or fifteen other of the larger works of the country and press them to completion in the same way.

I invite careful attention to the statement made by Gen. Casey (published as a part of the remarks which I made on Friday last), which establishes beyond question two facts; first, that the construction of these works has been enormously expedited by this system; and secondly, that they are completed, or will be completed, with great economy to the Government. It would be, in my judgment, a most unfortunate thing if Congress should over turn it's back on this system, which is the first and the only business system that has ever prevailed in reference to these public works since I have been in Congress. If we are to carry on these great works at all we ought to carry them on in such a way as will secure their completion within a reasonable time and as will result in the greatest legitimate saving to the Treasury.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Is the gentleman prepared to state the extent to which other governments are now carrying on the improvements of water ways?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am not prepared at this moment to make any very accurate statement on that subject. I may, however, call the attention of my distinguished friend to the fact that there has just been completed a great ship canal, fairly dug out of the earth, connecting the city of Manchester with the city of Liverpool, and costing some seventy or seventy-five million dollars.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. That canal to which the gentleman refers is a magnificent work, which will undoubtedly be of great advantage to the commerce of Great Britain. Now, we have on our Pacific coast a place where two miles of canal would open communication with a great fresh-water lake and would be of immense advantage to commerce, saving the enormous expense caused by the teredo which we have heard about here, and making other savings; and yet, although we have had surveys and reports of engineers on the subject for the last twenty years and have expended $10,000 on a new survey, and although my State has offered to donate the necessary land, the fact seems to be that we can not secure any consideration from this body for that project.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Without undertaking to pass judgment at all on the project to which the gentleman refers, I will remind him that it is one which will be very expensive, which is estimated to cost some millions.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. About $2,000,000, in round numbers.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Yes, it is estimated to cost about $2,000,000, and we did not feel that at this juncture we could take on that project, or any other that would be so expensive. I have no doubt, however, that two years from now we shall be able to give his project as full and fair consideration as it is entitled to, and I think it is more than likely that it will find its way into the bill. The committee certainly have no prejudice against the project, and have not rejected it at all.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I do not wish to be misunderstood as charging that the committee has any prejudice against that project.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, they have not rejected it.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I desired merely to call attention to the fact that for the past twenty-five years the United States engineers have made surveys and have recommended the project, and as the gentleman was mentioning canals, having had no other opportunity to mention this one, I took this occasion to direct attention to it.

Mr. GRESHAM. The Argentine Republic has spent $50,000,000 on two harbors within a short period.

Mr. CATCHINGS. My friend from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] has kindly furnished me some statistics, which I will insert in my remarks. I have not time to read them now because I must yield the floor to other gentlemen.*

But, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I wish to say that in this age of falling prices all over the world there has grown up a demand for cheaper transportation which no language can adequately describe. If gentlemen could see the delegations who come before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors from every section of this country clamoring for the improvement of their small and their large water ways and for the deepening of their harbors, they would understand that it all means a general demand for cheaper transportation which may to some extent offset the depressing fall in prices which has taken place and is still going on all over the world. Therefore this is a time when, instead of halting or turning back, we should go forward and try to give the people the relief in this direction which they demand.

Why, sir, I undertake to say that but for the opening up of the rivers, and the deepening of the harbors of this country which has been going on with a fair measure of success for the last twenty years, hundreds of thousands of acres of land that are now cultivated with some degree of profit would be absolutely abandoned; and, in view of the results already obtained, and in view of the general demand of the people for cheaper transportation, no man here should hesitate to vote the most liberal appropriations for these purposes. Mr. Chairman, the value of a water way can not always be determined by the amount of transportation upon it. I remember a remarkable statement made before the Senate Committee on Transportation some years ago by Mr. Albert Fink, the great railroad expert, to the effect that the freight rates on every railroad east of the Rocky Mountains were fixed in view of the competition of the Great Lakes and the Mississippi River.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, the Missouri River has the same relation to a great deal of our territory.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have no doubt that that is true. Mr. Chairman, if we do not meet the just demands of the people in this direction we shall certainly be recreant to the highest duty that we owe them. I have never felt that a single dollar appropriated for rivers and harbors has been badly spent. Of course there has been waste. There will be waste under any system, but the good which has resulted has been so much greater than the possible injury from any waste that may have occurred, that no man can justly say, viewing the matter broadly, that a single dollar which has been voted for rivers and harbors has been improperly appropriated or spent.

Mr. PICKLER. Can the gentleman give us some idea of what improvements the Missouri River Commission contemplate, from Sioux City down to the mouth, during the coming year under this appropriation?

Mr. CATCHINGS. If my friend will turn to the sixth volume of the reports of the Chief of Engineers he will find what they state on that subject. The report is very short, as I remember it, and simply states that they have been prosecuting their work and that they have reason to believe that they will succeed in perfecting the contemplated improvements.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, but they mention various items, and I do not know what they contemplate doing this year.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have spoken longer than I intended, and I must yield the floor to others.

How much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has thirty-eight minutes remaining.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN].

Mr. HERMANN. Mr. Chairman, no legislation enacted here has so fully demonstrated by practical results its beneficial character and its wisdom in the same space of time as the legislation of the Fifty-first Congress applying the contract system for these great public works, and when the history of that illustrious Congress shall be written, of all the monuments to its wisdom and its practical sagacity none will stand out in bolder view than its adoption, for the first time in the history of the country, of the policy of placing the work of improving the great water ways of this nation under the contract system. Now, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as my time is exceedingly limited, I shall be compelled to epitomize very largely and to go right to the facts.

Let us look at the saving from placing about eighteen of these great public works under the contract system. The authorized contracts amounted in the aggregate to $47,883,500. Of this amount twenty-seven millions, I may say, including the amount which is embraced in the pending bill, has already been or will soon be appropriated: leaving, in round numbers, as the Chief of Engineers informs Congress, $19,000,000 yet remaining to be appropriated of the forty-seven million and odd dollars authorized. Of the $19,000,000, it is expected that in two years time the last dollar will have been appropriated. Now, I propose to show that of that $19,000,000 a large portion has already been saved by virtue of the contract system.

I hold in my hand a list of a few of the eighteen projects upon which a great saving has already been made. Commencing with the Hudson River in New York, there has been a saving of

*NOTE.—The following brief statement of expenditures for the improvement of water ways in other countries, referred to above, is taken from an interesting and instructive article on "River and Harbor Improvement," by Hon. N. C. BLANCHARD, of Louisiana, in the North American Review for March, 1894:

"Our neighbor, Canada, with about one-twelfth of our population and with resources and wealth in nowise comparable to ours, has expended on her transportation routes (lakes, rivers, canals, and railways) more than $300,000,000, including 1,300 miles of railway constructed and equipped by the Government.

"England has only 13,000 miles of coast line—not much more than one-twentieth of what we have. Yet she expends $20,000,000 annually upon the same; $30,000,000 has been expended on the Clyde, which is but a rivulet compared with the Mississippi; and $82,000,000, all told, upon the Mersey, which is but a spring branch compared with the mighty "Father of Waters."

"Upon some of her harbors Great Britain has expended large sums—over $5,000,000 at Portland, over $5,500,000 at Holyhead, and over $7,000,000 at Plymouth. The figures may be much larger than these. I have not before me the expenditures for the more recent years. The great ship canal connecting Manchester with the sea at Liverpool, a distance of about 40 miles, was formally opened, amid great rejoicings, on the first of the present year, having been completed at a cost approximating $80,000,000.

"France, with about three-fifths of our population and one-seventeenth of our territorial area, has expended since 1814 upon her harbors and waterways more than $550,000,000, in addition to $700,000,000 upon her railways. The aggregate length of her navigable rivers and canals is about 7,000 miles—not much exceeding the navigable length of the natural water ways in the single State of Louisiana.

"Germany in 1877 authorized the construction of more than 1,000 miles of new canal routes in addition to the 1,250 miles then in operation and her 4,625 miles of available navigable rivers."

$295,264; on Charleston Harbor there has been a saving of $981,000—nearly a million dollars; on Savannah Harbor, $244,000; on Humboldt Bay, California, $975,115; at the Cascades Locks on the Columbia River, $223,735; on the ship channel in the Great Lakes, providing for a minimum depth of 25 feet of water, extending over 1,000 miles of navigation, there has been the magnificent saving of $2,035,556; on the Great Kanawha there has been a saving of $247,078; on the Hay Lake channel, St. Marys River, in the Great Lakes, a saving of $900,000. These make, in round numbers, upon these great projects a saving of $6,000,000. Now, taking that $6,000,000 from the $19,000,000 leaves $13,000,000.

I omit the estimate of the saving at Baltimore, Philadelphia, Galveston, St. Marys Canal, Mobile Bay, the Mississippi River, and the Missouri. And it is in testimony before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, through the showing of the Chief of Engineers, that when the improvement of Baltimore Harbor was practically completed it was discovered that there had been a saving of nearly 33⅓ per cent under the contract system, as compared with the system formerly in vogue.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I take the position that in view of all the reductions which have been shown to have been made under this system there will be a round saving of at least $9,000,000, leaving only $10,000,000 yet to be appropriated in future appropriation bills for the entire completion of every one of the great harbors which have been placed under the contract system.

Now I come to a point on which I desire to address myself to the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I take the position that the time has already arrived when arrangements should be made for placing ten or fifteen other great works of this nation under the contract system. By the time that the next sundry civil bill is before Congress every dollar necessary to complete these great works will have been provided for, leaving nothing further to be appropriated for as to contract works, unless legislation shall be provided through the river and harbor bill, whereby the Committee on Appropriations may be authorized to prepare appropriations for the contracts which the Secretary of War will then be authorized to enter into. So that I say the time has already arrived when this Congress should take into consideration the wisdom of providing for other works under this system. There are plenty of them; and unless that is done this generation will never live to see the time when many of the projects which have been recognized by Congress will have been completed.

Take, for instance, the improvement of James River. Three million three hundred and thirty-six thousand dollars will be required to complete that project, and only about $200,000 is being appropriated biennially for the completion of that project. Take the Delaware River, for the completion of which $1,475,000 will be necessary; Raritan River, New Jersey, $1,482,412; Harlem River, New York, $1,805,000; Coos Bay, Oregon, $2,131,412; Michigan City, Mich., $249,613; Toledo, Ohio, $1,200,000; Tonawanda Harbor, New York, $1,008,000; New Haven Breakwater, Connecticut, $1,541,134; Sandy Bay Harbor Refuge, Massachusetts, $4,400,000; Boston, Mass., $1,300,000; Winyard Bay, South Carolina, $2,181,250; Coosa River, Georgia, $4,843,074; Yazoo River, Mississippi, $1,215,000; Cumberland River, above Nashville, Tenn., $6,725,000; Tennessee River below Chattanooga, Tenn., $5,837,939; Tombigbee River, Alabama, $627,400. And when you add to these the Portage road of $454,000 or canal of $3,500,000, which is to be constructed upon the upper Columbia, or the Puget Sound Canal, and some works in contemplation in California, I submit that this generation will have long passed away before one-half of these great harbor ways are completed if we are to appropriate for them as we have been doing biennially in very small sums of money.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me Congress should recognize that the only way by which this generation can ever see the completion of these works is to place them under such a system that there shall be annual appropriations in such liberal sums that these works shall be completed within a reasonable time, and at such reduced cost as we have found is accomplished through the contract system. It is no longer a matter of experiment; it is an accomplished fact. The figures are before us, and some of the great works are already practically completed under this system. We now know what we are doing. It is such a system as good business principles prompt in any successful private concern, and it is equally meritorious for the Government itself to adopt.

I further insist that the Committee on Appropriations should include other works in a future bill, and that it should not be necessary to provide for the maximum estimate, but that less should be appropriated each year, so that a greater number of works may be included. There can be a reduction allowed, for the law permits that. Whoever takes a contract under the Secretary of War for one of these works takes it with this provision of the statutes in full view:

Provided, That such contracts as may be desirable may be entered into by the Secretary of War for the completion of existing projects or any part of the same, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law.

Every contractor undertakes the work with this understanding—that if the whole amount is not appropriated in one bill, he must take his chances for getting the amount in some future appropriation bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, no person better fitted to defend the present system and the system which has been in vogue for some years with reference to rivers and harbors could have been selected than the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], whose many kind and genial qualities of mind and heart have endeared him to this House, and who in presenting a statement to this body aims always to be eminently fair. And I desire to say that no one can possibly object to this contract system who is "in" on the proposition; but those who are upon the outside and can see that they will be compelled to wait for fifty or one hundred years for the improvements of their rivers and harbors may possibly have some little cause for complaint. In defense of this system, the gentleman from Mississippi is ably seconded by the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HERMANN], who by his industry here since he has been a member of Congress has secured more of the "plunder" for his people than any person who has ever represented the Pacific coast.

Mr. HERMANN. I hope my friend, who is so earnestly in favor of river and harbor improvements, will not describe these appropriations as "plunder."

Mr. LOUD. I am making these remarks with due deference to the gentleman. What I am saying is a compliment to him. It is these very acts that have sent him back to this Congress year after year with increased majorities.

Here is the principal objection to the river and harbor propositions. Money has never been appropriated with the object in view of benefiting the whole country, but appropriations have been made to satisfy certain interests. And now in regard to Oregon, as I have mentioned the gentleman, I will say this: Oregon has been ably represented in Congress for a great many years by the same Senators and the same Member of Congress. They have become acquainted with the system here and have been enabled, with their familiarity with the subject and their industry, to secure large appropriations for their State.

I am not opposed to river and harbor appropriations, but have been, and shall always continue to be, in favor of the most liberal appropriations for that purpose. You can not go to too great an extent in improving the rivers and harbors of this country to suit me. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], who has presented one side of the case, can raise no possible objections to a presentation to the House at this time of a few facts and figures that he himself, by his own kindly nature and kindly feeling toward me, prevented me from presenting two years ago. The gentleman well knows that I sought at that time, being a new member of this House, to procure a preliminary survey for a harbor in my district. I was told by the then chairman that I could not have it. It was a proposition that would have cost the Government probably a dollar or a dollar and a half.

I then went to work and prepared the figures which I now have upon my desk. Upon consultation with the gentleman from Mississippi he said to me, "You do not desire to oppose this river and harbor proposition; I can fix this for you." He did so; and the figures never were presented. But this table embodies a truthful statement; and I believe it will be useful to this House for consultation in the future. I will not go over all the figures; I have not the time, and I do not desire to weary the House, but I will say that up to 1890 the Great Lakes received, in round numbers, $12,000,000; the Atlantic coast, $57,000,000; the Gulf of Mexico, $20,000,000; the Mississippi Valley, $76,000,000; and the Pacific coast, $9,000,000.

Now, of course, when appropriations are made, the amount of commerce to be benefited by the appropriation should be taken into consideration. Many gentlemen here from the South have claimed—they did so particularly when the pension appropriation was under consideration—that they receive no benefit from the taxes levied and collected by this Government. But when we look at the figures of the appropriations for rivers and harbors, and take into consideration the amount of Southern tonnage and the value thereof, it will be found, I think, that those States are treated very liberally in this direction. The Gulf States have received alone up to 1890 (saying nothing of $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 in contemplation) $20,497,000. The number of vessels is 833, the value of such vessels $3,518,000, and the tonnage 62,830. So that when you take into consideration the amount of the tonnage, the Gulf States have been pretty liberally treated.

I have said before that I am in favor of the improvement of rivers and harbors from a legitimate standpoint; but it is a question whether these appropriations have not been influenced or dictated by favoritism.

It is a question in my mind whether it would not have been cheaper to have taken railway transportation to deep tide water at the port of Savannah, rather than have brought deep tide water to the present railway termination. I only state that as one instance; and it is a question whether the same conditions do not exist in other portions of the country.

But I think the attention of this House and country should be drawn particularly to the improvements that have been going on, and which are still going on in what is known as the Mississippi system.

In a little table here I have given the amount of appropriations that have been made to the whole South. The Gulf of Mexico has received $20,000,000. I will only give the round numbers. Virginia has received $3,000,000; North Carolina, $4,000,000; South Carolina, $3,000,000; Georgia, $3,000,000; making a total of $34,611,000. Now, the Lower Mississippi has received over $24,000,000; the Red River and incidental thereto, $1,500,000; making a total of a little over $60,000,000. Adding to that the appropriations made to the Mississippi and the Ohio systems, not including the lakes, the sum of $52,000,000, and we have a total of more than $116,000,000 that have been appropriated to the Mississippi system and the South.

My principal objection, however, is to this Mississippi system, because the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. CATCHINGS] has stated on two occasions that a large amount of money expended there has been expended principally to protect private property.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Oh, no.

Mr. LOUD. Well, incidentally, then?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I said it had the effect of protecting private property incidentally, but I said it had been expended because it was insisted that it was necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] has expired.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to put in the RECORD the figures which I have quoted from.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER].

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I, in company with my colleagues on the floor, have been interested and instructed by the able arguments presented by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. CATCHINGS]. He brought to the consideration of this question, as he always does, ability, eminent fairness, and much painstaking care. There was in that address and argument much which we all commend; but with all due respect to that gentleman, if he wishes us to understand his argument as a commendation of the system of improvements which have been in vogue upon the Missouri River; or, on the other hand, if it was intended to antagonize the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. MERCER], then, with all due respect to the gentleman, I am constrained to enter my most emphatic but yet respectful dissent.

Mr. Chairman, what is the object of this Missouri River Commission? Its first and great object, in the broad sense, is and must be to facilitate and extend commerce; not simply to make that river navigable, though that may be incidental to the final object to be attained.

What is the character of the commerce along this stream? Clearly it is of a double character. First, it is the commerce which extends up and down the stream itself, and secondly, the commerce which goes over and across the stream.

As a matter of fact, the commerce which extends up and down that stream is, as the gentleman himself admits, inconsiderable. On the other hand, the commerce which passes over the river at the city of Omaha alone exceeds all the commerce which floats either on the Mississippi River, the Missouri River, or both combined. There is no question about that fact.

Let us get at the truth of this matter, the real kernel of it; for what we want to do here, as intelligent legislators, is to expend the money of the people in serving the needs of the people. We are not interested simply in making a stream navigable if no commerce is to be benefited thereby; and if there is more of benefit to be had in improving the river along those points where commerce is engaged, then it may be wise and to our interest to expend money for that purpose.

We are not coming in conflict here, Mr. Chairman, with the general principle of the contract system, but that contract system does not mean that the banks of a river are to be improved step by step from its mouth to its source, or the converse, to the exclusion of all considerations for the commerce crossing the river nor to the exclusion of other public interests.

When the Missouri River Commission was first instituted they laid down the proposition in their very first report that, for engineering reasons, improvements must extend from up the river down, and not from down the river up; and I challenge the attention of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors to that fact. "Engineering necessities require that the work should progress down stream," and that "no very great benefit will be conferred upon the commerce of the United States before the improvement shall extend from the mouth to Kansas City," is the exact language of the report made December 9, 1884.

Mr. STEPHENSON. When was that?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. In the very first report, in 1885. To this conclusion the Commission has continued to adhere. It would, therefore, seem that gentlemen who insist that the improvement should be from the mouth up are involved in a quarrel with their pet Commission. In 1886 and in 1887 their reports attest that no considerable benefit can possibly accrue from the improvement of the Missouri River until it shall have extended to the great cities, which are the initial points of commerce. This is a self-evident fact—one which must be conceded by every gentleman giving the subject even a casual examination. What are the important points along the Missouri River?

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman how much money has already been expended on the Missouri system?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. A trifle over $4,000,000.

Mr. LOUD. My figures give it over $7,000,000, and I think my figures are correct.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The amount which I refer to is the amount which has been expended between Sioux City and the mouth of the river, since the institution of the Missouri River Commission. I can give the gentleman the exact figures.

Mr. LOUD. I mean since the foundation of the Government.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The amount which has been expended between the points I have mentioned, up to the 1st of February, 1894, since the organization of the Missouri River Commission was $4,094,475.72. I have not the figures covering the time before this. As I was proceeding to say, the principal points along the Missouri River are, first, Kansas City, then St. Joseph, Atchison, Nebraska City, Omaha, and Sioux City.

Mr. PICKLER. Yankton and Pierre.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I beg the attention of the members of the House to this matter, which is certainly of vast importance to us in the West. Four million dollars have been expended by this Missouri River Commission since its institution. How has that money been expended? I find of that money there has been spent at Kansas City and its immediate vicinity, in round numbers, $658,000. At St. Joseph there has been expended $287,000; at Omaha and Council Bluffs, $247,000, while in the first reach of this work near Jefferson City, covering a distance of 14 miles, there had been expended over $1,000,000 on the work direct. When we add to that the proportion expended for salaries, and properly chargeable to this work, and other like expenses, we reach the stupendous aggregate of $1,506,256.20, out of the $4,000,000 which has been expended in toto.

How much has commerce been benefited by that vast expenditure? By the report of the Commission, which I hold in my hand here, I find, as I have already stated, that no considerable benefit can possibly be hoped for until the work reaches at least to Kansas City. To complete the work within that 14 miles will require perhaps an additional half a million dollars. But waiving that and treating it as completed, we have at least $100,000 per mile to make that stream navigable. How is the work being done? They have simply made a new channel for the Missouri River, crowding it away from the only rock bank of which any mention is made in the reports, along the entire extent of that river.

Now, at that rate, Mr. Chairman, how much money will be required to bring that Missouri River into a navigable condition from its mouth to Sioux City? Why, it would take $80,000,000. How much time will it require at the rate which work has been progressing? It will take one hundred and twenty years. And yet these gentlemen say that the contract system requires that all expenditures be made in continuation of this project, slower in execution than the wrath of God, and more expensive than the most prodigal would care for one moment to stand as sponsor for.

Take the report that is now before us. Where does this Missouri River Commission propose to expend the appropriation? In addition to the payment of its salaries and traveling expenses, it proposes to expend every dollar of it down there in the first reach, every dollar of that $750,000.

The Commission proposes to make such disposition of the appropriation continuous. I am opposed to further continuing this misuse of the people's money. Why, when they have completed the work at Jefferson City, they simply cover the 14 miles of which I have spoken. They purpose to continue the work in spots down the river. That point is 150 miles and more from the mouth of the river.

Do they propose to continue directly to the mouth? Not at all. They say they propose to go down to the Gasconde River, which is 40 miles down the stream from the 14-mile works of which I have spoken and expend the money there. If there is anything in this contract system which would require the work to be continuous foot by foot, mile by mile, and reach by reach, what becomes of the plan of this Missouri River Commission? It falls to the ground entirely. But if you wish to take a broader view of it; if you wish to conserve the interests of commerce, it seems to me you should protect the commerce at the great initial points, where it begins and ends to-day.

Let me illustrate that by taking the city of Omaha, for that will serve as well as any other city. The Missouri River is a sinuous stream and capricious in its course. It winds its way in and out its mud banks, varying from day to day. It has in fact, no permanent banks. The great bluffs are in places four miles from the river. The great manufacturing interests, water works, business, the manufacturing and the like in that great city are necessarily on the low land and next to the river. Three bridges span the river. Over those three bridges five grand trunk lines pass and repass, carrying millions and millions of tons of freight.

The trade which passes over those bridges is not local, Mr. Chairman; it is interstate, transcontinental, and may within the limits of truth be designated as international. Let me observe that one of those bridges, that of the Union Pacific, in which this country as a country has a very vital interest, is even now being threatened by changes in the channel and current. Along the banks of this river are the largest smelting works in the country, large car shops, and the municipal works of that mighty city. The city of Council Bluffs is on the other side of the river. There are these two cities, practically one, joined by these bridges, with a population approaching a quarter of a million, a busy hive of industry, manufacture, and commerce, in which the whole West is directly interested, and yet you say these improvements are local. It seems to me that you can not understand the situation.

Another fact to which I wish to call attention is this. Every engineer knows, and every member of Congress who has given this matter five moments' attention, knows that these works along the river were not intended to be continuous and never were intended. The convex banks of the river protect themselves. It is only the concave banks that need protection. They are the periphery of the current, so to speak, and these are the only things that you wish to protect. At the upper part of the city the bend in the river approaches the Omaha side. Day by day and month by month the river has encroached upon the city of Omaha, until to-day it is dangerously near Florence Lake, a part of the old river bed which practically divides the city into equal parts. Let the river once break into this old bed and we may expect a large part of Omaha to be made a part of Iowa. We are as at present advised not in favor of this territorial cession to our Hawkeye neighbors. Again, the river swings around until it approaches Lower Omaha, and there the current again turns to the Nebraska side and threatens these bridges.

These need protection. The cities of Omaha and Council Bluffs have expended twice as much to protect these interests as the Government has expended; and yet you say there should be no further expenditure on the part of the Government there. Why should this money be confined to this single reach at Jefferson City? There is not a single boat engaged in commerce which is entered as from Jefferson City. That city, comparatively and commercially speaking, is of no importance. No single public interest is conserved by that work. The greater part of the up and down traffic on the Missouri has its origin and its only and whole extent almost in the immediate vicinity of the great cities. The report of the Commission shows that one-third of the entire transportation on that river is the transportation of sand which the Missouri River Commission has had dug out at one place and deposited at another. Nearly half the transportation is that of materials transported for the Commission, and only about 35,000 tons was long-distance freight.

Taking these facts into consideration, it seems to me there should be no question about the matter. Where do you want improvements along such a river as that? There can be no such things as harbors in the country. The harbors must be limited to the cities. The course of the river through the country makes, comparatively speaking, but small difference. It may cut off from a farmer here and there a few acres of his land and give it to his neighbor over the river; but changes of channel at cities are attended with most serious results. It is in the cities that vast interests are centered, and where are situated also all the great instrumentalities which you must conserve if you would maintain commerce. There is no question about that. If you want to place the money where it will do the most good, you will place that expenditure in the neighborhood of the cities.

What cities or places are there which present any greater arguments for consideration than Omaha and Council Bluffs?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. St. Louis.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. They are the most populous of the cities on the Missouri River. They have double the population of almost any other city on the river. They have by far a greater commerce and their transcontinental commerce is much larger than that of any other city on that stream. These are considerations which certainly ought to appeal to the Congress of the United States.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. If I understand his position it is this—and it seems to me I am in harmony with him—that in the name of improving the navigation of the Missouri River, practically, this money is being spent, and ought to be spent, to protect the banks of the river, the harbors, the landing places, etc., where they need protection about the great cities of Kansas City, Leavenworth, and Omaha; and I understand the gentleman claims now that a sufficient amount of this money, a fair amount of this money, considering all the interests that are in need of protection, in the name of navigation, is not being expended at Omaha and at Sioux City; and he is seeking to have a larger amount of the money expended there?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have great sympathy with the gentleman in the matter, and I thought it was as well to understand his position.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Take the appropriations asked for here. They are $750,000. What does this Commission propose to do with that? It proposes to pay for traveling expenses and salaries $20,000, for surveys, permanent bench-marks and gauges, $30,000; for operating snag boat, $35,000; and for a system of improvement in the first reach, that means from the mouth of the Osage River down, about 150 miles, $665,000, which makes up the whole $750,000; and not a particle of it is for the protection of the real commerce that goes across this river, or for the protection of the great interests which ought to be protected, as it seems to me.

Now, then, as I have said, there is no pretense that there is any commerce whatever down here on this first reach to speak of. We are not asking that all the money shall be diverted from the first reach and placed at Omaha and Council Bluffs; but we submit that at Omaha, Atchison, and Leavenworth, where the stream is making great encroachments upon the cities and upon the commerce of those cities, that we ought at least to have a portion of it, that at least one-half of the amount appropriated ought to be devoted to that purpose, and not all of it on the first reach.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. HEARD. What difference would there be in principle in insisting on spending these moneys for the protection of the railroad bridges at Omaha and at Kansas City than in expending it for the protection of private people in my district to prevent their farms from being washed away by the river? What is the difference in the principle involved?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman's question is a fair one, and I will give him a frank answer. The only authority which we have for making any expenditure whatever is for the protection of commerce, and for facilitating and expediting commerce.

Now, then, in these large cities the protection of these banks, the protection of these bridges, and the protection from other loss by the river is connected intimately with this interstate and transcontinental commerce carried on by and from those cities. Without this there would not be justification for it; but it is because of this interstate and transcontinental commerce that we have the right to ask it.

Mr. Chairman, it is evident that the projected work of the Commission is interminable, extravagant in expenditure, impractical, and necessarily barren of useful results.

To make the shallow Missouri, with its variable mud banks and bottom navigable, necessarily involves the construction of a channel constructed of solid masonry from its source to its mouth. You must secure it against filling up.

This is out of the question.

Common sense and ordinary business judgment require that we protect the great commercial points and the arteries of trade, transportation, and commerce, and at present at least attempt nothing further.

It is juggling with words to say we have the right and upon us is imposed the duty of making a liberal appropriation for the protection and promotion of travel up and down the river, but have no right or should not appropriate a reasonable amount for the protection and promotion of the commerce which crosses the same river; that we should expend $2,000,000 for the benefit of a so-called port in Missouri which has not even a single boat, but have not the power to expend a single cent for the benefit of one of the most important cities of the mighty West, and which is in the direct path of the commerce of the continent. If you insist upon continuing the experiment of making this river navigable by legislation, we insist upon fair dealing and an application of sound business judgment with respect to that far greater commerce which crosses the Great Muddy.

It is time that great national interests located in the West were heard in these halls. The South and East find ready audience, and their petitions seldom denied.

Of this I do not complain, but submit to your sense of fairness that the reasonable and just claims of the West be no longer ignored.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally, and Mr. TATE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles:

On March 9, 1894:

An act (H. R. 4770) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Arkansas River at or near Van Buren, Ark.;

An act (H. R. 5833) providing for the rescue of the armament and wreck of the United States warship Kearsarge;

Joint resolution (H. Res. 108) authorizing Maj. Gen. Oliver Otis Howard, United States Army, to accept from the President of the French Republic a diploma conferring the decoration of commander of the National Order of the Legion of Honor.

On March 12, 1894:

An act (H. R. 5846) making appropriations to supply further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

On March 14, 1894:

An act (H. R. 9) to transfer the Morris Island life-saving station, near Charleston, S. C., to Sullivans Island.

An act (H. R. 5485) to amend "an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the East River, between the city of New York and Long Island," approved March 3, 1887; and

An act (H. R. 4571) to make service connections with water mains and sewers in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee again resumed its session, Mr. LESTER in the chair.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word first as to the point of order reserved on Friday upon the amendment which I offered and which is still pending. The objection was that that amendment interfered with or changed existing law. The law authorizes the Missouri River Commission the use of this appropriation as the commission deem best. They may use it wherever they choose within the limits named. I do not understand that this amendment proposes to change existing law; it simply restricts or controls the discretion of the Commission as to the expenditure of this appropriation. It leaves the law precisely as it is now, but limits the discretion of the Commission as to this particular appropriation. It in effect directs the Commission to expend $75,000 at Atchinson and Leavenworth, Kans. This is all that I care to say on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. To what amendment does the gentleman refer?

Mr. BRODERICK. To the amendment which I offered, diverting a portion of this money to be used at Atchison and Leavenworth. It has been contended here by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS], the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee, that the only way to improve the Missouri and make it a navigable stream is to commence at its mouth and work up. I concede that there is something in that contention. I believe it is wise to complete the work commenced on this river, and I believe that it must be done if the river is ever to be made an artery of commerce useful to the people living in that country. But, while the Commission is doing that, they should not overlook the damage that is being done at other points on the river.

For instance, the breaks and changes being made at Atchison and at Leavenworth, or opposite those cities, could now be improved in a substantial way by a small expenditure; at Atchison for thirty or forty thousand dollars and at Leavenworth for from twenty to twenty-five thousand dollars; but if those breaks are allowed to go on and the river permitted to spread at Atchison over a mile or more of ground instead of being confined to its present channel, then in place of thirty or forty thousand dollars, a half a million of dollars will be required to repair the damage to the channel and open the river to commerce at that point. The Commission commenced, as I understand, by reserving 25 per cent of the annual appropriation for emergencies that might happen along the river at other points than where their work was going on; that is, they reserved that sum from what was necessary for the continuing contracts. Whether they are now pursuing that policy I can not say, but they began in that way and it seems to me it was a wise policy. They understood fully that these breaks could be much more easily and more cheaply repaired at their commencement than if they were allowed to go on for years, so they began by making that reservation of 25 per cent from the continuing works.

Something has been said, either in this discussion or before one of the committees, to the effect that the citizens of these towns and the railroads were under obligation to make these repairs. Mr. Chairman, since the Commission was established no money has been used by them at either Leavenworth or Atchison, but thousands and thousands of dollars have been expended there by the citizens and by the railroads in protecting their interests. At Leavenworth, within the last two years, more than $25,000 has been expended by private citizens and by the railroads, and now, by the expenditure of an additional sum of twenty or twenty-five thousand dollars, the river could be improved there permanently, so that there would be no further appropriation asked at that point for a number of years. The railroads and the citizens of Atchison have been making substantial improvements there, and would be willing to improve further, but if they go on to make the improvements that they design, and which will be necessary to stop the break at that point, they will be threatened, and they are already threatened, with damage suits. I send to the desk and ask to have read the testimony of a witness who is on the ground as to this point:

The Clerk read as follows:

W. F. Guthrie, who was over from Atchison yesterday, says there is serious danger of the Missouri River cutting across the bend just east of Atchison and leaving the east end of the railroad bridge standing on an island. The river has reduced the distance between the washing bank and the five railroad tracks that enter Atchison from the east from a mile to only 200 feet. The bank could probably be protected by riprapping, but if this were done and the current thrown in another direction the railroads would throw themselves open to suits from parties further down the river where the bank would probably be cut. There is plenty of money in the hands of the Missouri River Commission, but none of it is available for making this needed improvement. The worst feature of the cut would be that a stagnant lake would be left adjoining Atchison and there would be no current for carrying away the sewage.

I think I can say, Mr. Chairman, that there is no point on the Missouri River where there is such a present emergency as exists at Atchison, and forty or fifty thousand dollars would now make the necessary repairs and improvements at that point, but if the work is not done this year it will take a much larger sum.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I send an amendment to the desk to be read, which I will offer later.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of line 5, page 64, insert:

"Provided, That $100,000 of the said sum shall, in the discretion of the Commission, be expended above Sioux City, Iowa, in the protection of harbors and rectification of bank protection on said river."

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire first to call attention to the provisions of the law defining the powers of this Missouri River Commission. I read from the Supplement, 1874 to 1891, page 465:

That it shall be the duty of said Commission to superintend and direct such improvement of said river and to carry into execution such plans for the improvement of the navigation of said river from its mouth to its headwaters—from its mouth to its headwaters, as may now be devised and in progress, and to continue and complete such surveys as may now be in progress, and to make such additional surveys, examinations, and investigations, topographical, hydrographical, and hydrometrical, and to consider, devise, and mature such additional plan or plans, and all such estimates as may be deemed necessary and best, to obtain and maintain a channel and depth of water in said river sufficient for the purposes of commerce and navigation, and to accomplish the objects of this act, and to enable the Commission to perform the duties assigned them the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to transfer to and place under the control and superintendence of said Commission all such vessels, barges, machinery, and instruments, and such plant as may now be provided, devised, or in use on said river, from appropriations heretofore made for said river, or other sources, and when thereto requested by said Commission to detail from the Corps of Engineers such officers and men as may be necessary, and to place in the charge of said Commission any such vessels, machinery, and instruments under his control as may be deemed necessary.

Now, the amendment that I have offered does not increase the amount carried by this bill. The bill provides $750,000 for the Missouri River below Sioux City. The amendment that I offer does not seek to increase the amount appropriated, but simply diverts $100,000 of this appropriation, in the discretion of the Commission, to the 1,800 miles of river that are above Sioux City. This $750,000 is to be appropriated for the river from Sioux City down, and I simply propose by this amendment that $100,000 of this money shall be expended from Sioux City upward. In offering this amendment I have specially in view the ratification of the banks at Fort Pierre. Pierre is the capital of our State, and Fort Pierre is the town across the river. The river has been encroaching at that point, and this amendment which I desire to see adopted is not merely for the protection of the town—though I confess that that is an "incidental" object, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] puts it—but it is necessary for the harbor there, and, as I understand, it comes strictly within the rule governing the committee and the Missouri River Commission in reference to these improvements.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. The portion of the Missouri River between Sioux City and the mouth was put under the contract system, and it is by virtue of that provision in the last river and harbor bill that the item of $750,000 is placed in the pending sundry civil bill. Now, the gentlemen proposes, as I understand, to divert $100,000 of that money to be used upon the reach of river above Sioux City which is not under the contract system.

Mr. PICKLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. Let me read the gentleman a provision of the last river and harbor bill:

Improving Missouri River between the foot of the Great Falls of the said river, in Montana, and Sioux City: Continuing improvement, $150,000, a portion of which may be used, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, in the rectification of said river and bank protection at the cities of Pierre and Yankton, S. Dak.

Mr. PICKLER. That is the act of 1892?

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. Yes; the act of 1892 gave you $150,000 for these points.

Mr. PICKLER. Does the gentleman claim that my amendment is inconsistent with that?

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. I claim that you are seeking to divert from the portion of the river which is entitled to it under the provisions of the river and harbor bill, a sum of money to be applied to a stretch of the river that does not come under the contract system, and that was specially provided for by another item.

Mr. PICKLER. But it is not provided for in this bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama. No; it was provided for in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. PICKLER. My purpose in reading the act prescribing the organization and duties of the Missouri River Commission was to show that their jurisdiction extends over the river from its mouth to its head waters. That is the language of the law. They are not confined to the portion of the river below Sioux City. I find by referring to the report of the Commission that the proposition for improvements for this portion below Sioux City is as follows:

For office and traveling expenses and salaries of Commission	$20,000
For surveys, gauges, physical data, and publications	15,000
For operating snag boat	35,000
For repair of revetment in vicinity of Council Bluffs, Iowa	15,000
For repair of revetment in Belmont Bend	30,000
For systematic improvement in First Reach	585,000
Total	700,000

I find that the expenditures last year, which it is proposed to continue this year, were on about 14 miles of river—largely from Murray's Bend above Jefferson City down to Dodd's Island below the Osage—a total distance of about 14 miles.

A MEMBER. From what are you reading?

Mr. PICKLER. From the sixth volume of the Engineer's reports; what the Commission say, page 3922. When I inquired of the gentleman from Mississippi this morning as to what particular work the Commission intended to perform from Sioux City down, he referred me to the report of the Commission, but it will be seen that this report, as I then suggested to the gentleman, shows that of the lump sum appropriated in the bill for general improvement, a very large percentage of it—$585,000—has been expended in this single locality. This large sum was expended on a portion of the river about 14 miles in extent, as I understand.

Now, I claim that with 1,800 miles of the Missouri River above Sioux City, and in view of the fact that at such points as the capital of our State the river is making encroachments, destroying the harbor and endangering property, a portion of this money ought to be in all fairness appropriated there; and this will not interfere, in my opinion, with any of the work below this point. It seems to me we are entitled to this. As these large sums are given year after year to this Missouri River Commission to be expended below Sioux City, certainly we ought to have some protection for those towns with their property above that point.

Mr. PICKLER. I only wish to add that in my amendment I have used the language of the act of 1892.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD].

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Chairman, in the five minutes accorded to me, I wish to speak in opposition to the pending amendments offered by the gentleman from Nebraska and the gentleman from Kansas. I regret as much as anyone can the exigency which prompts their efforts for the relief of their people. I am fully aware of the very great hardships under which their people are suffering; but those hardships are no greater than those endured in my own district or in any other district along the line of the river.

Now, the weakness of their position is that they desire an appropriation to be made confessedly under false pretenses; in other words, they desire as an appropriation for the improvement of the navigation on the river money which is in fact to be expended for the preservation of private property. If that principal is a sound one and is to be generally adopted, all right; let us proceed upon it; but the correctness of such a principle is negatived by the practice of the Government throughout its entire past history. It has been settled for a long time that no money can be expended by Congress directly for the preservation of private property; but that if such protection results, it must come as an incident only to the consummation of a public work.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska rose.

Mr. HEARD. I can not yield to the gentleman now; he must excuse me; I will yield to him later.

Now, Mr. Chairman, some years ago, when this Missouri River Commission plan was adopted, I did not favor it. I did not then approve the plan now being proceeded upon. Yet it was the judgment of the engineers of the Army; and I am candid enough to say it was concurred in by a majority of the people of my section. The newspaper press joined in the support of the engineers in declaring that the expenditure of small sums of money from time to time, at localities named in the bill appropriating the money, had resulted in no general improvement of the navigation of the river, and that the plan should be abandoned for one contemplating general and systematic improvement. I yielded, Mr. Chairman, to that sentiment.

At the time the present plan went into effect in 1890, appropriations had been made at two points in my district for the restoration of the channel of the river infront of two of the harbors; and the work had been partially done; but on the adoption of this plan, that work as well as other such work along the river was abandoned. The engineers insisted upon being permitted to spend this money, as the Missouri River Commission does, according to their judgment, in systematic continuation of the work at important points, in order to demonstrate the feasibility of their plan for improving the general navigability of the river. Whether that plan is feasible or not, I do not undertake to say; but I am here to say now in justice to all the people along that river, and to the taxpayers of the entire country, that since this plan has been entered upon it should be given a fair trial; and if it is demonstrated to be a failure, we should abandon all efforts at improving the river, at least until some more feasible plan presents itself than has yet been considered and acted upon.

We should not ask Congress to spend money upon any plan unless we can get results. We are told by the engineers that in much of the work under the old plan we have failed to get results. They have faith that we will get good results under the present plan. I hope they are not mistaken. So long as this plan is in vogue, so long as it is in force against the farmers of my district, whose farms are being washed into the river every year; so long as it is enforced against the people of Glasgow, whose harbor is now seriously threatened by the recession of the river, I say that the rule which has been made applicable to my district should stand with reference to the districts of the gentlemen asking for these amendments. In other words, we should proceed upon a general plan, and apply the same rule to the district of every gentleman who represents a constituency on this floor.

Realizing, Mr. Chairman, that it is impossible for me to get for my people the favors sought by my friends from Kansas, Nebraska, and Dakota for theirs. I must insist on simple justice to all alike—that the same rule be applied to all alike.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska rose.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEARD. I am sorry that I am not able to fulfill my promise to the gentleman. I will try to procure for him hereafter the opportunity he has sought to ask me a question and for myself the time to answer it.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to enter again into any particular discussion of the contract system or the amounts that have been expended for the improvement of rivers and harbors. But it seems to me that in some manner I have been misunderstood. The only thing that I have declaimed against is that the appropriations for the twelve favored projects are at the rate of 100 per cent per annum of the estimates, while the appropriations for all other projects are at the rate of only 20 per cent—one-fifth of the estimate of the United States engineers. I believe this discrimination to be unjust; and so believing I made reference to the appropriations that heretofore have been made for other sections of the country.

While I have the floor, I desire to state that early last week, when the question of the survey of the public lands was under discussion, I made some criticisms in regard to some testimony relative to surveys given before the Committee on Appropriations by the gentleman who occupies the position of Assistant Commissioner of the General Land Office. He has very properly sent me a statement relative to that matter; and inasmuch as it appears from his statement that he has lived in the West and understands something about the public domain in that country, having been a special agent of the Land Office, and inasmuch as I indirectly charged him with a want of acquaintance with such subjects, it is only proper I should make public acknowledgment that I was mistaken so far as he was concerned.

Personally I desire to do no man an injustice, more especially one who has no opportunity to make reply on this floor. Hence I make this frank and public acknowledgment of my error. I was drawn into my criticism of that gentleman, however, by the testimony which he gave before the Committee on Appropriations. In that testimony he recommended (and I think the committee will bear me out in this statement) that a law should be passed that the surveys of public lands in townships should be made in whole or in part by those who have settlements in the same; and it was this recommendation that caused me to make the criticism, because that had been the law since 1889.

Again, the gentleman made some statements that while he had been traveling in the West he found a township surveyed upon the mountain tops in Wyoming; and he brought that one lone isolated example before the committee, which in my judgment did an injustice to the whole system of public land surveys.

The following is from the hearings of the Subcommittee on Appropriations having in charge the sundry civil appropriation bill:

Mr. BOWERS. I would like to make a suggestion to you gentlemen here; in fact, two suggestions in reference to these surveying contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to have them.

Mr. BOWERS. I would like to have this appropriation made a continuing one for this reason. Very often a surveyor will perform the work, but it will be defective in some parts and we do not want to accept it. It is essentially all right; but we come right to this point, either this money is going back into the Treasury and we can not pay him or we have to accept the survey that is not entirely satisfactory to us, and for that reason I believe it would be a very good plan to make this surveying appropriation a permanent appropriation until expended—that is, when a contract is let that the money shall be available until that thing is either finally accepted or finally rejected. Then another thing, a remark in reference to Montana brings it to my mind. I have been perfectly disgusted to find where some of these contracts for surveys have been let. I noticed one in a region of Wyoming where I have hunted elk. It was on top of a range of mountains in the midst of a most barren desert, and I do not expect to live long enough to see any settler go in there.

Now, if there were limitations upon the expenditure of this money that would prevent this sort of survey just where it is an absolute waste of the public money I would be very glad to see it put in. While I am in the office I do not propose to see any such surveys made, but I would like for it to be embodied in the law.

The CHAIRMAN. Look on page 83 of the bill. You will see there a proviso which has been coupled with the appropriation for several years, but which in your estimates for 1895 you propose to omit:

"Provided, That in expending this appropriation preference shall be given in favor of surveying townships occupied, in whole or in part, by actual settlers and of lands granted to the States, by the act approved February 22, 1889, and the act approved July 3 and July 10, 1890, and other surveys shall be confined to land adapted to agriculture and lines of reservation."

Why should that stay in; that was intended to accomplish the very thing you suggest?

Mr. BOWERS. Was this in the bill of last year?

Mr. COURTS. It has been in every bill since the fiscal year 1889.

There is no question, sir, of the necessity of survey of public lands. Settlers are put to no end of inconvenience and hardship. Nor is this all. States are injured almost irreparably by the failure of the Government to locate the lands which have been granted for school and other purposes to them.

Sir, I have in my district 10,000 settlers upon unsurveyed lands. Year after year, month after month, they have been calling for surveys. They want to secure their homes, as any man would under the circumstances. It is on this account that I stand here, Congress after Congress, seeking more extensive appropriations in that direction. Many of those for whom I speak are known to me personally, and accordingly I take a keen personal interest in their rights and wrongs. I have known many of them from the ground up, and have watched them for years while they spread the seed and gathered the harvest. They have fought a brave fight, and redeemed the desert of twenty years ago. They fought their battle alone, and all they ask now is justice and their fair share of the appropriations made by the General Government.

In this connection I desire publicly to make my acknowledgment to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL]. I am profoundly sensible of the great aid he has given us and the great benefits he has extended to the people of my State in his efforts to secure a proper appropriation for the surveys of the public lands. We feel profoundly grateful to him for his services in that matter. That gentleman rose here the other day and called my attention to the amounts which our section of the country had received.

It is true that over $200,000 has been appropriated for work of this kind in my State. But in working faithfully, as I have done, for enlarged appropriations of this kind, I have been influenced by the fact that there could be advantageously used in our State a million dollars for this purpose without the people of other States being called upon to pay a single cent of the appropriation, because the money would all come out of the fees paid at the local land offices. We support those local land offices; we support the General Land Office; we pay the clerks in the General Land Office, and we turned into the coffers of the United States last year a net revenue of $4,000,000.

Why should we not have these surveys? Why should not the people have their homes? Why, sir, before I came to Congress you appropriated money for the establishing of a life-saving station at Petersons Point. That was eight years ago, and no effort has ever been made by the Department to build it. In the Fifty-second Congress, at the first session, I secured an appropriation for a light-house at Grays Harbor. Nothing whatever has been done about it. As I said the other day, outside of Umatilla Reef, the most dangerous place on the Pacific coast, no appropriation has been made.

Inside of the Straits of Fuca the British Government are building fortifications to cost $7,000,000. We have fortification sites, but no appropriations, and nothing but the sites and the flag of our country to protect $100,000,000 of property. Should not something be done for the people? Coming along down we have the great proposition that has been recommended by the United States engineers year after year for a canal to connect the fresh waters of Lake Washington with Puget Sound.

[The time of Mr. WILSON of Washington having expired, by unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. CATCHINGS, it was extended five minutes.]

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I make my acknowledgement to the House and to the gentleman from Mississippi for this courtesy. Now, passing down the sound and coming to Tacoma, there is a city of 45,000 people. Right in front of them is an Indian reservation of 16,000 acres, and almost absolutely unused by the Indians. These Indians are educated, they have their lands patented, they vote, they exercise all the duties of citizenship. Yet they stand there, blocking the commerce, the enterprise, the building up of that city. No railroad can come into it, no proposition to aid commerce can be successful there, without the consent of the Department of the Interior, or the Congress of the United States.

What ought to be done is that the restriction in those patents be removed and those Indians be permitted to sell their lands, subject to the control of the price by the Secretary of the Interior, leaving them 10 acres each for a home. Ten acres of that land is worth more than many a 160-acre farm in the Mississippi Valley. We have the great Yakima Reservation and the Colville Indian Reservation standing in the way to block the commerce and trade and prosperity of my State. In addition to that we have passing through the State a grant of land 60 miles wide on each side of the railroad, and on the 10-mile strip, or what is known as the indemnity strip, we have 10,000 people living, and who have been living there for fifteen years and can not obtain title to the land because the question can not or will not be settled by the Department of the Interior.

We want the railroad companies to take out their patents. We want them to pay taxes and help bear the burdens.

We want to open these Indian reservations. We want to give the people the land. We want to protect the Indian also in his rights. Let the commerce and trade of the country in the West go on, and let the people develop that State as they want to do; but in everything, it makes no difference whether it is the survey of public lands, there are difficulties encountered. Why, here is the affidavit that every settler has to make who lives in a township of public lands before he can have the land surveyed:

PETITION FOR SURVEY.

STATE OF WASHINGTON, County of Stevens, ss:

I, Thomas H. Greenaway, of lawful age, being first duly sworn, on oath depose and state that my post-office address is Valley, Stevens County, Wash.; that I am a bona fide settler and resident for the purpose of securing a home in township 31 north, range 39 east, Willamette meridian, under the preemption or homestead laws of the United States, and I respectfully request that you cause a Government survey to be made of said township at as early a period as possible, that I may be able to secure title to my said home therein.

I further state that I am well acquainted with the character and condition of the land embraced in said township, and that the same is not mineral nor reserved by the Government; that there are about 20 actual settlers in said township, and that a good portion of the land is valley, bench, and hill land, and if surveyed would soon be settled up; the land in part is mountainous and heavily timbered with fir, tamarack, and pine, and covered with a dense undergrowth of the same, and that after the timber and dense undergrowth are removed is good agricultural land, capable of producing in paying quantities all kinds of farm crops grown in this section; and I verily believe the whole of said township can be surveyed.

I further state that I made personal settlement on said land the 10th day of April, 1892, and my residence thereon has continued to the present time, and that I have the following improvements on my claim to the value of $350, viz, clearing and slashing of timber 12 acres, cabin built, orchard started, etc.

I further state that this application for survey is made in good faith and not for the purpose of enabling a surveying contract to be obtained, nor at the instance or for the benefit of any other person than the actual settlers and residents of said township. So help me God.

THOMAS H. GREENAWAY.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 1st day of May, 1893.

A. V. SHEPLER,
Justice of the Peace in and for Stevens County, State of Washington.

To the UNITED STATES SURVEYOR GENERAL,
Olympia, Washington.

Mr. Chairman, in these days, when times are hard and money scarce, our people desire to have every opportunity to sell their products and develop their enterprises, and I send to the Clerk's desk something which I wish to have read, which shows, as much as any statement I could make, the injustice that is being done the people whom I have the honor in part to represent.

The Clerk read as follows:

Another instance of Democratic patronage of home industries has just come to light in the awarding of a $100,000 contract to the Connox mine, Vancouver Island, to supply the Bering Sea fleet of warships with coal the coming season. The contract was made despite the protests of the Washington, Oregon, and Montana Senators, and regardless of the fact that the State of Washington is full of coal, the vicinity of Bellingham Bay possessing the finest steam coal on the Pacific coast. That American industries should be deliberately passed over in favor of British mines for the coaling of American warships seems almost incredulous, but Cleveland and his toy statesmen can be depended on every time to turn down an American in the interests of a foreigner.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, do you not think, does not the American Congress believe, that these contracts could have been made with American citizens, working American mines, and producing coal through American labor? Would it not have been best, and would it have not been proper, would it not have been just, in these times of great disaster, in these times of great financial depression, to give an opportunity to the American laborer and the American citizen of that Western country? Would it not have been better that these men-of-war that sail the seas should have pushed themselves through the water by steam made by American coal? Would it not have been better that those vessels that fly the flag of our country should have purchased their supplies from our own citizens? Why should we give prosperity north of the forty-ninth parallel, and depression and disaster south of it?

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Chairman, I fully appreciate what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] said a few moments ago with regard to the importance of continuing the contract system which has been in force so long upon the Missouri River. But there are certainly cases where an exception must be permissible. My colleague from Kansas has offered an amendment which is intended to protect the river at Atchison and Leavenworth. Those are points where the citizens have exhausted every possible resource. The railroad companies have expended thousands and thousands of dollars, and it is a case of emergency which threatens the property of a great many people, and which should certainly be entitled to some consideration. There has been no money expended by this Missouri River Commission on that part of the river since its organization, which was, I believe, in 1884.

We think that the time has certainly come when some attention must be paid to the wants of that section of the country. Everyone familiar with the Missouri River knows very well that there are emergencies that arise in handling that river that must be attended to immediately. Otherwise the damage becomes irreparable.

At Atchison the course of the river is threatening to change, in a manner that will leave the city some 3 miles inland. It will destroy an enormous amount of agricultural land, it will destroy bridges that have been erected, it will destroy the railroads, and it will reduce the town to the position of an inland town on the banks of a stagnant bayou, destroying its commerce entirely so far as its river is concerned, and utterly destroying its communication for years with the eastern side of the river by railroad.

At Leavenworth the people have built a dike three-fourths of a mile in length at a cost of over $25,000, in order to protect their bridge. Their resources are exhausted, and they think that in some way the attention of this Commission ought to be called to the urgency of the case at that point. We desire that no additional appropriation shall be made, but simply that the Commission may have some authority, which I believe is what they ask for themselves, to vary their rules somewhat in that direction. They do not ask that this system shall be changed, but that the great emergency which has arisen at those points should receive some recognition at the hands of the Government, whose duty it is to protect the property of the people along the banks.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, as a part of my remarks I send to the Clerk's desk a letter which has recently been addressed to me on the subject under discussion. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BECKER, MO., March 9, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: It has come to our knowledge, through Capt. Hickman, of Herman, Mo., that efforts are being made to divert a large portion of the money appropriated to improve the Missouri River between Jefferson City and its mouth, to points far above Kansas City, St. Joseph, and Omaha. This movement is undoubtedly instigated in the interest of some railroad, and should be checkmated at once. You are doubtless aware that the undersigned were the first movers and instigators in getting this large appropriation for the Lower Missouri River, through the help of Congressman Niedringhaus, Frank, Norton, and others.

Now, while we have as yet had no money spent in our district, St. Louis and Franklin Counties, for the improvement of the river, we still live in hopes; and for these upper river sharks or whoever they are, that have had millions of dollars spent on their part of the river, to now ask for what is left of our appropriation to be diverted to their interests is, we think, a gross injustice. We are informed through a private letter from Capt. Hickman to Judge Hirzel, that a determined effort is being made by these parties (that undoubtedly have large influence) to divert this appropriation. A petition has been gotten up by Capt. Hickman and sent to us, protesting against this diversion. We would like to know of you at once if such a petition would be of any avail? If so, we will have it signed by thousands of people in St. Louis and Franklin Counties, in your district.

Your friend, Mr. F. W. Kuhlmann, one of the undersigned, has already lost at least 150 acres of his valuable farm, one of the finest in St. Louis County, and the river now is within 100 yards of his home; and it is a little hard to think that the appropriation which was gotten largely through his individual efforts, should now be diverted, and his house and farm left to go into the river, and that probably because some railroad corporation wants to save its bridges. We write this with the view of hearing from you at once what we shall do in regard to circulating this petition.

Yours, truly,

F. W. KUHLMANN,
A. J. CUMMINGS.

HON. RICHARD BARTHOLDT,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Now, Mr. Chairman, while I know nothing about the charges contained in this letter, I do know that every word said about the losses sustained by those farmers is true; and I know furthermore that of all the Missouri River appropriations not one cent has thus far been spent for improvements at or near the river's mouth. That part of the river with St. Louis and Franklin Counties, represented by myself, upon one side, and St. Charles and Warren Counties upon the other, represented by my friend [Mr. CLARK of Missouri], has been entirely ignored by the Commission, and for the purposes of these Missouri appropriations that territory might as well have been located in the moon.

Against this neglect I enter my protest here, in the name of St. Louis and these adjoining river counties. It is well known that in the Fifty-first Congress, after an inspection made by members of this House, it was agreed, by tacit understanding if not in express terms, that all the improvements should be begun at the mouth of the river, and from there continued upwards. The same understanding prevailed, as I am informed, when the Fifty-second Congress made its river appropriations. Why, allow me to ask, were those implied conditions not lived up to? Why were they entirely disregarded and ignored by the officials having this work in charge?

We are told that under existing law no money could be spent for the protection of lands fronting on our rivers. Well and good. I give the Missouri River Commission, as well as our Chief of Engineers, Gen. Casey, an official as conscientious as he is efficient, all the credit due for a faithful enforcement of this provision of law; but if indirect protection is being afforded to railroad property, we hold that the property of the farmer is entitled to the same incidental protection. And, indeed, if the law prevents the property of the citizens from being protected, it seems to me to be time that the law be changed. I venture to say that more good would be done by spending the money for the protection of lands than by adhering to the present plan. However, at this time we do not come here, Mr. Chairman, to ask for an exemption from that legal injunction, but we do insist that we are just as well entitled to legitimate river improvements, if not more so, than any other river territory. We are satisfied in this case with the incidental protection which may be afforded by such improvement, and incidental protection being the youngest Democratic doctrine, I hope my appeal will not be in vain. St. Louis, the metropolis of the Mississippi, with her great manufacturing and commercial interests should, I contend, be entitled to some consideration at the hands of this Congress, and to give expression to this idea I have prepared an amendment which I shall offer hereafter, and which provides simply that the improvements of the Missouri River shall be begun at its mouth. As a matter of policy I believe that the law should be changed so that protection might be afforded to the property of our citizens, and by affording protection the commerce and navigation of the river may be benefited.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER].

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read at the Clerk's desk a memorial and joint resolution passed by the Iowa State Legislature, which resolution has been handed me by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAGER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorial and joint resolution relative to the improvement of the Missouri River near Council Bluffs, Iowa.

Whereas the Missouri River is seriously cutting into the banks of the State of Iowa opposite the city of Florence, Nebr.; and

Whereas by reason of said erosion the stonework put in by the Government to protect the northwest boundary of the city of Council Bluffs, Iowa, has been already damaged, and is in great danger of being totally destroyed unless the river in that vicinity shall be fully protected; and

Whereas the business interests and the population centered in the vicinity of Council Bluffs, Iowa, demand that the river at that point shall be confined in a fixed and permanent channel: therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and are hereby, earnestly requested to use all honorable means to secure an amendment to the bill appropriating money for the improvement of the Missouri River, which shall require that a sufficient amount shall be expended on said river in the vicinity of Council Bluffs, Iowa, to protect and render permanent the channel of said river.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be, and is hereby, instructed to forthwith transmit a copy hereof to each Senator and Representative from Iowa.

Approved February 28, 1894.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, the members of the Iowa and Nebraska delegations have been in receipt of memorials of this character from the city councils of Council Bluffs, Omaha, Florence, and South Omaha; and there is no doubt in my mind that if the Legislature of Nebraska were in session to-day it would pass similar resolutions. I call attention to these transactions that the House may be impressed with the importance of this legislation to these States.

I had read last Friday a substitute to the section providing for the expenditure of money by the Missouri River Commission. I desire to submit that substitute to-day to be considered at the proper time, and will suggest a change in the amendment so that it will cover the territory beginning at the south line of the State of Nebraska instead of the mouth of Platte River and extending to Sioux City, Iowa. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out whole section referring to Missouri River Commission and substitute therefor the following:

"Under Missouri River Commission: For improving Missouri River from its mouth to the south line of Sioux City, Iowa, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Missouri River Commission, surveys, permanent bench marks and gauges, $740,000, $50,000 of which may be used for removal of snags and other like obstructions in the Missouri River above Sioux City, Iowa, and from the south line thereof, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and $150,000 of which shall be expended in the construction, repair, maintenance, and extension of revetments, dikes, and other work between the southern boundary of the State of Nebraska, where it borders the Missouri River, and Sioux City, Iowa.

Mr. MERCER. Mr. Chairman, I desire that to read "between the southern boundary of the State of Nebraska, where it borders the Missouri River, and Sioux City." I desire that change to be made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of politics. It is a question of business. If this Congress does not see fit to recognize the needs and necessities of the people along the Nebraska and Iowa shores, in the provisions and the appropriations suggested in this bill, then why should not this Congress, in the river and harbor bill, increase this appropriation $200,000, in order to allow the relief of those people who need it so much and who make such strenuous requests for it? I give notice now, that if some relief is not afforded the cities of Omaha, South Omaha, Florence, and Council Bluffs, at this time, another and a more determined fight will be made for such recognition when the river and harbor bill is brought in for consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I find in examining the Missouri River, from its mouth to Sioux City, that the only rock banks to be discovered are those along the first reach—the last place one would expect to see protected artificially. Yet the Government has expended or will have expended at the end of June, 1895, in the neighborhood of $1,700,000 in this first reach. I take the position that it is unfair to expend so much money on this reach when other parts of the Missouri River are in need of an equal amount of attention. For instance, at Council Bluffs, Iowa, the Government has expended $110,000 in the improvement of the banks of the Missouri River.

Every dollar's worth of that work will go out perhaps in the next six months, perhaps during the next June rise, unless something is done by the Government to protect the revetments and dikes already constructed. I desire to thank the gentlemanly chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and his associates upon that committee for the kindness with which they have treated me in all my interviews with them, and I trust they will yet see their way clear to afford the relief asked, if the House deems it inappropriate at this time to make an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. COGSWELL. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts has three minutes remaining.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the people of Missouri in general, and my constituents in particular, have a deep interest in the improvement of the Missouri River. My district skirts the Mississippi 150 miles, straddles the Missouri, and has, besides these two great rivers, four other streams navigable by acts of Congress. Three of them, however, are not navigable by steamboat. [Laughter.] Still another, which I rather inopportunely undertook to cross one chilly day when I was a candidate for Congress, I found contained enough water to float a two-horse buggy. [Laughter.]

The trouble is that a great many members speak here on subjects about which they are not well informed. Now, nothing could be more reasonable or more sensible than the plan of beginning at the mouth of the river and improving upward. Yet the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] would begin at the upper end and improve downward. That is like constructing the apex of a pyramid before laying the foundation, and building the top story of a house before erecting the lower stories.

Somebody has imposed on my friend from Omaha [Mr. MERCER] and made him believe that enormous sums of money have been squandered in improving 14 miles of river near Jefferson City. A great deal of money has been expended, but a large part of it has been used in establishing the necessary plant and machinery.

Here is the situation about that first stretch of the Missouri River. It reaches from Jefferson City to the mouth of the Missouri River—about 200 miles. Some 20 miles below Jefferson City the Osage River comes in from the southwest. Fourteen miles below the Osage River the Gasconade comes in from the southwest; and right between these two rivers at Gasconade City they have established the headquarters of the force of men who are improving the Missouri River. Last summer I went down there, looked at it, and talked to the men; so that I know the truth about it. They have a small navy-yard down there.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not dispute——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute.

THEY ARE DOING A GREAT AND PERMANENT WORK.

They had to spend thousands and thousands of dollars in getting the plant ready. It does not make any difference now whether they located it at the right or the wrong place, it is there; and I think it is the right place; but you talk as if all that money has been spent on those 14 miles. They located this plant between these two rivers because the Government is improving both the Gasconade and the Osage as well as the Missouri. The same plant, machinery, and boats can be used for all three, and not only for the lower stretch but for all above. An immense amount of commerce comes out of the Osage and Gasconade. Here is what they are doing. They are trying to confine the channel of the Missouri River by a system of jetties.

Mr. PICKLER. By masonry.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They are doing it by masonry and timber and by sinking mattresses of willow. They are applying, in the worse parts of the Missouri, the same principle that Eads applied to the jetties, and it is all nonsense to come in here and insist that as much money shall be spent on one mile of the Missouri River as on another mile. Some miles need a great deal of work, some need none. They take the worst place first and work on it until they have finished it. That appears to me the feasible plan.

For years the bill to improve rivers and harbors resolved itself into a great game of grab, in which every member, whether he lived on the arid plains or by the seashore, had to have his part of the appropriation or he kicked. Public interests were lost sight of, and logrolling was the order of the day. Finally Senator FRYE, Mr. BLANCHARD, Gen. CATCHINGS of Mississippi, Gen. HENDERSON of Illinois, and others, among them Mr. HEARD of Missouri, decided to put an end to this senseless and wasteful scramble. For their labors they deserve well of the country. They devised the plan of the River Commission, the contract system, and fixed appropriations. They brought order out of chaos. I am not objecting to improvements at St. Joe, Atchison, Omaha, or above Sioux City, but what I insist on is that the plan on which the Missouri River Commission is working shall have a fair trial, and that no part of the necessary funds shall be diverted to points farther up the river. That would be to sacrifice and destroy all that has been done.

One of two things is absolutely certain. Either the Missouri River will be improved on the present system or it will be abandoned, for the people will never consent to the old plan of spending vast sums of money and doing no good with it.

Some gentlemen are anxious to know if private property is not benefited by these improvements. Of course it is, not as a primary purpose, but as an incident. There never has been an appropriation for river or harbor since the flood that did not incidentally enhance the value of private property somewhere.

I know it is difficult for people who have been acquainted only with such streams as the Penobscot, Susquehanna, Hudson, Ohio, Tennessee, Kanawha, and Kentucky, all of which have firm, fixed banks, to understand our Western streams. These latter practically in many places and in many cases have no banks. The base of all that Mississippi Valley soil is sand, the richest soil in the world, but still sand. Frequently the bed of the river is only a few inches lower than the level of the flat country on the two sides, consequently the width of these streams is out of all proportion to the depth, and by spreading out too much they constantly swallow up farms so rich that it makes a man's mouth water to look at them and his heart sick to see them cave into the insatiable Missouri and Mississippi. [Laughter.]

The natural process is that they go on forever, spreading wider and wider, getting shallower and shallower, swallowing a plantation to-day and a town to-morrow. There is always enough water in the Mississippi and Missouri to float the largest ocean steamers, if it could be confined within reasonable channels. To accomplish this is the object of the Government, and it is being done successfully by an application of the principle of the jetty system. If this is accomplished, and those great inland seas are once more made the arteries of commerce, who has the gall to object, even if private property is incidentally protected?

One gentleman is anxious to have the army engineers do the work. Are we sure they would do it any better? Has West Point a monopoly on that sort of instruction? I would cast no slur on army engineers; but I can never forget that when that illustrious Missourian, Capt. James B. Eads, the greatest civil engineer the world ever saw, declared that he could improve the mouth of the Mississippi so that the largest ocean steamers could anchor at New Orleans the year around and was pleading with Congress to give him a chance, all the army engineers declared he was a crank and that his plan was the scheme of a visionary. He got his appropriation and began deepening the channel and they kept predicting failure. He succeeded gloriously, and humanity is largely his debtor.

But what I say is this: Whether under civilian engineers or army engineers, let the good work go on. I am for the best engineers, wherever they may be found.

It is said that commerce has departed from these rivers. I am aware that the golden age of steamboating on the Mississippi and Missouri, so gorgeously described by that celebrated Missouri historian, Mark Twain, is past forever. His dream of making one city of New Orleans and St. Louis by cutting off the bends in the Mississippi can never be realized.

Steamboating, however, is reviving on those rivers; but we have a far weightier reason for wanting them improved. It is this: If they are made navigable in fact, they will become and forever remain the great regulators of railroad freight rates. We desire to use the waters in these rivers to relieve ourselves from paying dividends on the water in railroad stocks. We want to emancipate our commerce from the grip of monopoly. We want such improvement that we can load our wheat and corn and pork and beef into ocean steamers at St. Louis, and unload it from the same vessels at Liverpool. These great rivers and their tributaries wash the shores of twenty-odd States and Territories, the richest under heaven, and certainly they deserve the most generous treatment at the hands of the American Congress.

Let Puget Sound and other places have what they are entitled to, but do not try to divert any part of our Missouri River appropriation from its legitimate uses.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate be extended ten minutes.

Mr. SAYERS. I must object.

Mr. PICKLER. You will save time by giving us ten minutes more.

Mr. SAYERS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I will agree that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] may have five minutes and the other side five minutes, and I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended ten minutes.

Mr. COGSWELL. I desire to call attention of the Chair to the fact that the House, by unanimous consent, extended the time five minutes, and gave that additional time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON], so that by the action of the House itself, the vote is not to be taken until thirty-five minutes past 2 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I have fifteen minutes left.

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir. The time to take the vote has arrived.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The Chair announced, when I concluded my remarks, that I had thirty-eight minutes left.

Mr. SAYERS. The House ordered the debate to close at half past 2.

The CHAIRMAN. So much time has been occupied in discussions like this that if the gentlemen are to have the time agreed upon for debate the vote must be postponed to a time later than that fixed by the House.

Mr. SAYERS. The order was that the debate was to close at half past 2.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, I am willing that the vote should be taken now.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, in order to oblige gentlemen on both sides I ask that the time be extended ten minutes longer from this moment; the time to be divided equally between the sides.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will understand that each side has already had so much time. About ten minutes have been taken up in discussions about the time.

Mr. SAYERS. Even so, the order of the House was that debate was to close at half past 2. But I now ask unanimous consent that the time be extended ten minutes longer, and that it be divided equally, five minutes to each side.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am willing to have the vote taken right now, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. In that case, I ask permission to straighten out and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Missouri is entitled to five minutes more. He lives in that part of the country and knows more about the Missouri River than most of us, and I would like to hear him, even if he is opposed to my amendment.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my request be put to the committee that the time for debate be extended ten minutes longer.

The request was agreed to.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I say, Mr. Chairman, that locating that plant between the mouth of the Gasconade and the mouth of the Osage is an economical performance. The Gasconade is to be improved 150 miles and the Osage is to be improved 150 miles, and the same boats that are used to improve the Missouri can be used to improve all three rivers.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK].

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, it must be apparent to every one who has heard this discussion that the appropriation here for the improvement of the Missouri River is not sufficient. It is claimed that no money has been expended at certain important commercial points on that river since the organization of the Commission. I am certain that that is true as to the two points named in my amendment, Leavenworth and Atchison. I want to say a word as to a letter which was read here.

The claim is made in that letter that no money has been expended near the mouth of the river, but there is no statement that that part of the river is not navigable or that any expenditure was necessary to improve the navigation there. The claim is that money should have been expended there because it is necessary for the protection of private property.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. BRODERICK. I have only three minutes. Now, we make no such claim as that as to the points embraced in my amendment. The fact is that if the banks there are not protected, and the river is allowed to spread over three times as much ground as it now covers, it will destroy the channel for purposes of navigation and destroy commerce at those points; so that the matter of protecting private property is with us a secondary matter, and is not the specific purpose for which we ask this appropriation.

We know that the appropriation for the whole river ought to be increased, but as under the rule we are not permitted to offer an amendment to increase it, we are compelled to ask that a portion of this money shall be diverted from the other portion of the river to these two points. This amendment, therefore, does not increase the amount of the appropriation in the bill.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I simply wished to say to the gentleman that we are in favor of improving the river, but at the same time we desire the incidental protection which will result from such improvement.

Mr. COGSWELL. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this is simply a question of fairness. If this sum of money is going to be appropriated for the improvement of the Missouri River, then it is a mere matter of equity as to where it shall be expended, and there is no other way of compelling its expenditure along the northern portion of the river except by this amendment. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] will be adopted, because the river has changed its course there, and the change has interfered with the navigation and also has destroyed property along the banks. It may be that $740,000 is not enough for the Missouri River, but if that amount is not enough for the whole river, why should it all be expended at one point? If we are not able to appropriate money enough to do all that should be done along the Missouri, certainly what we do expend ought to be so distributed as to give equitable treatment to all sections.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, this is a more serious matter perhaps than gentlemen understand. I tried to explain the situation in the remarks that I made on Friday last. I then stated, which was the fact, that great demands were made on the River and Harbor Committee to do just what is sought to be done by the amendments now pending, that is, to divest and specifically direct the expenditure of certain portions of the appropriations at certain localities along the river; and having, unfortunately, yielded to some of the demands, we were besieged by others, and the thing progressed until, in 1888, the appropriation for the improvement of the Missouri River, which was a million dollars, was directed to be expended in the manner which I will now present to this committee:

Of that $1,000,000, $150,000 was directed to be appropriated between Council Bluffs and Omaha, $100,000 at Sioux City, $50,000 at Plattsmouth, $50,000 at Rulo, $75,000 at Nebraska City, $65,000 at Kansas City, $65,000 at St. Joseph, $45,000 at Arrow Rock, $75,000 at Leavenworth, $75,000 at Atchison, and $25,000 at Miami, making $775,000 out of the million.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Only $110,000 was spent at Council Bluffs.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I take these figures exactly as they are given in the appropriation bill; and they must be correct.

Sir, when the River and Harbor Committee assembled in 1890 we found that the demands for expenditures at these different localities had doubled in number, and that the estimates for the improvement of the river at these various localities had run up into many millions of dollars.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will be understood that the work at these different points being of the same character, it requires wherever done the organization of a plant to do the work at that particular place. So that if the work were done in that way it would simply require that we should multiply by ten or twelve the amount which would be finally needed for the improvement of the river. When we had reached that point we saw it was simply impossible to go on. We could not have refused to appropriate for these new projects if we continued the appropriations for the old ones. So we asked the gentleman interested in that river (as I stated on Friday) to meet the committee; and it was a matter of common agreement that the only sensible thing to do was to strike all these appropriations from the bill and make a general appropriation for the river, leaving it to the Commission to say where the money should be expended. If this amendment prevails now it means simply a return to the system which prevailed up to 1890——

Mr. PICKLER. How can the gentleman say that? That can not be the effect.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I say it because it seeks to do what we did prior to that time.

Mr. PICKLER. But here we let the Commission spend the money themselves; we do not take away the control of the work from the Commission.

Mr. CATCHINGS. You can not give specific appropriations to these two places without making similar appropriations named in the list. You can not discriminate. There are various other points on the Missouri River which would come forward demanding a diversion of the fund.

Mr. PICKLER. The work of this Commission, as I have shown, has been confined practically to a single stretch of 14 miles, where thousands of dollars have been spent in driving piles. Now, we desire that the money shall be devoted to the improvement of our harbors.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I can not yield to the gentleman; I have only four minutes.

So far as I am personally concerned it does not matter to me a particle what the House may do on this question; but occupying the position I do with reference to river and harbor matters, I deem it my duty to give the truth about the subject, so that the House may at all events act with intelligence. I say now that if you return to this system, it simply means that the whole Missouri River will be stricken from the river and harbor bill. It is utterly unreasonable to talk about having twenty different plants organized for the work on that river at an expenditure of millions and millions. I do not wish to add another word. The House will do whatever in its best judgment it thinks should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. There are three minutes remaining.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to occupy that time.

Mr. BLAND. To which side do those three minutes belong?

The CHAIRMAN. They are under the control of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman from Mississippi will yield to me, I will occupy that time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I think we may as well have a vote.

Mr. BLAND. I do not object to a vote; but if there is to be any more debate, I would like time to say that the proper way to improve the Missouri River, in my judgment, is the way the improvement is going on now.

Mr. PICKLER. Nobody disputes that.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first amendment be read—the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BRODERICK], upon which a point of order was reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kansas will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 1, page 64:
"Seventy-five thousand dollars of which, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to strengthen banks and improve the river, shall be used at and near Atchison, Kans., and at Leavenworth, Kans.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that this amendment does not change existing law in such a manner as to come within the prohibition of the rule. The bill as reported makes a certain appropriation for the improvement of this river; this amendment merely directs what shall be done with a portion of that appropriation. In the opinion of the Chair, it is competent for the House on an appropriation bill to direct where the money appropriated shall be expended. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been ruled upon.

The question being taken upon the amendment of Mr. BRODERICK, it was rejected, there being—ayes 55, noes 87.

Mr. MERCER. I renew my substitute for the paragraph.

Mr. PICKLER. Is not my amendment now in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at end of line 5, page 64, the following words:
"Provided, further, That $100,000 of said sum shall, in the discretion of the Commission, be expended above Sioux City, Iowa, in the protection of harbors and rectification of bank protection on said river.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I make a point of order on that amendment, and desire to be heard upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I make the point of order that this amendment proposes new legislation. This is the point which was raised on Saturday last against an amendment which I offered. I then called the attention of the Chair to the fact that my amendment proposed simply to direct the manner in which a part of the appropriation proposed by the bill should be expended. In the present case, as in that case, we have an appropriation for a certain purpose, and it is proposed in the pending amendment to say how a portion of this money shall be expended. Now, according to the view of the Chair as expressed on Saturday last, the very fact of such an amendment being offered is to be construed as implying some conflict with existing law; otherwise, according to the reasoning of the Chair, it would not be necessary to offer such an amendment upon an appropriation bill.

Although this point of order has not been made against other appropriations in the bill, no doubt it would have been equally good against them. I submit that in accordance with the decision heretofore given by the Chair, a point of order lies against this amendment for exactly the same reasons that were regarded as applicable to my amendment which was ruled out on Saturday last.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order of the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] is not well taken. The present amendment does not propose to change existing law, while the amendment offered by the gentleman from California on Saturday last did so propose. That is the difference between the two propositions. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PERKINS. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, to make it conform to the action taken by the committee the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to amend the pending amendment?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. Let the amendment be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the Pickler amendment as follows:
"After the word 'above' insert the words 'the south line of.'"

Mr. SAYERS. Let us have a vote.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Has the Chair ruled upon the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been ruled upon.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I wish to say, if the Chair will allow me——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] to the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

The amendment of Mr. PERKINS was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I desire to offer an amendment to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will send it up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting on page 64, line 1, after the word "gauges," the words "the improvement to be begun at the mouth of the river."

The CHAIRMAN. That is not, the Chair thinks, an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER]. The gentleman will have an opportunity to offer it further on. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER].

The amendment of Mr. PICKLER was rejected.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I now offer the amendment which was just read a moment ago.

The amendment of Mr. BARTHOLDT was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERCER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask a vote on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER] offers an amendment to the paragraph, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the whole section referring to Missouri River Commission and substitute therefor the following:
"Under the Missouri River Commission: For improving Missouri River from its mouth to the south line of Sioux City, Iowa, including salaries, clerical, office, traveling, and miscellaneous expenses of the Missouri River Commission, surveys, permanent bench marks, and gauges, $740,000, $50,000 of which may be used for removal of snags and other like obstructions in the Missouri River above Sioux City, Iowa, and from the south line thereof, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, and $150,000 of which shall be expended in the construction, repair, maintenance, and extension of revetments, dikes, and other works between the southern boundary of the State of Nebraska and Sioux City, Iowa."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. MERCER].

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MERCER. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 94.

Accordingly, the amendment of Mr. MERCER was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

That section 4834 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:
"SEC. 4834. That the Board of Managers shall make an annual report of the condition of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War, to be submitted by him with his annual report to Congress at the commencement of each regular session thereof, and all laws or parts of laws that require the Board to audit and examine or authenticate the accounts of the treasurer and visit the Home quarterly are hereby repealed."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if I can get the attention of the committee, I wish to state that there are several gentlemen who desire to speak upon other portions of the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] be allowed fifteen minutes; that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be allowed twenty minutes, and that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] be allowed thirty minutes.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. On what point?

Mr. SAYERS. That these gentleman be allowed to address the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Generally?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; and that forty minutes be devoted to the discussion of the pending propositions.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a point of order on these propositions.

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; but gentlemen desire to make statements concerning them.

The CHAIRMAN. With the understanding that the points of order are reserved?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I will be obliged to object to this understanding, unless there is a division of time between the sides.

Mr. SAYERS. These gentlemen desire to speak upon various propositions in this bill, and they have had no opportunity to do so. I am willing that they shall be granted permission.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Why not say two hours, and give each side an hour?

Mr. BOWERS of California. I will withdraw the objection, inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] has been very kind to me. I wanted five minutes for myself, but it does not matter.

Mr. COGSWELL. I would like to have the Chair state the request again.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] be allowed thirty minutes in which to address the committee, and that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] be allowed twenty minutes, and that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] be allowed fifteen minutes, which makes sixty-five minutes; and that forty minutes additional be allowed to gentlemen who wish to make statements in regard to the pending amendments.

Mr. COGSWELL. Do you think that will be long enough?

Mr. SAYERS. I think so. If not, I will ask that the time be extended.

Mr. LOUD. What subjects do gentlemen desire to discuss?

Mr. SAYERS. They desire to speak, as I understand, on the general features of the bill,

Mr. LOUD. They are likely to raise points that some gentlemen may desire to answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from Texas is that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] have twenty minutes; that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] have thirty; that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] have fifteen minutes, and that forty minutes be given to general discussion of the provisions now under consideration. Is there objection to this request?

Mr. LOUD. Unless there can be some time reserved by somebody to answer points that may be brought up here, I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. LOUD. I suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] that he give us some time.

Mr. SAYERS. I will endeavor to arrange the matter.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself to the point of order raised against these paragraphs, and in order to do so I desire briefly to explain what the paragraphs are. I hope I may have the attention of the committee in order that no misunderstanding, no misconceived or preconceived ideas may prejudice the fair consideration of these paragraphs. In the preparation of this bill the duty of considering and reporting to the subcommittee having the matter in charge, the appropriation for the Soldiers' Home, was by the assignment of the chairman devolved upon me.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I want to know if we are touching now the point of order which I have raised?

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary situation is this: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] made a point of order against these paragraphs, which the Chair understands he reserves. The discussion is going on independent of that point of order.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I have no objection to any arrangement that will satisfy the gentleman; but I do not want to be understood as waiving the point of order.

Mr. COGSWELL. Oh, no; if the gentleman had heard me he would have known that I commenced by saying that I desired to address myself to the point of order, and in order to do so I desired briefly to review or explain the paragraphs against which the point of order has been raised.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. The order of discussion is a little unusual, but I shall not object.

Mr. SAYERS. I trust——

Mr. COGSWELL. When the point of order is raised against an amendment, and I rise in good faith to discuss that point of order, I think it is perfectly germane to the discussion that we should at least see what the amendments are against which the point of order is made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman to discuss the paragraph if he pleases to do so, the point of order being reserved.

Mr. COGSWELL. I desire to say that in the preparation of this bill the duty was assigned to me by the chairman, to consider and report to the subcommittee these appropriations for the Soldiers' Home. I considered the assignment as a matter of honor, and as devolving upon me an important responsibility. Full consideration was given to every estimate recommended or suggested for this home. The managers were heard at length; the Inspector-General's Department, whose duty it is to inspect and report upon the condition of this home, was heard; the managers of the Soldiers' Home were heard again in answer to suggestions from the Inspector-General's Department, and as a result there were incorporated into this bill larger amounts than the bill carried before for this great home. Many improvements requested by the managers were incorporated in the bill, and appropriations made therefor. And from our examination of the report of the Inspector-General several limitations and improvements were also made in this part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COGSWELL. I ask that I may have further time.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that the gentleman may have such time as he requires.

There was no objection.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, as I said before the interruption, the result was the appropriation of a larger sum of money than in the last bill; the putting in the bill of several matters requested by the managers and several clauses suggested by the Inspector-General's Department, looking to a better administration and accounting of the moneys of this home and its branches. As this was a matter close to my heart, and believing in the high character of the Board of Managers, believing in the beautiful munificence of the Government in providing these large and costly homes and so liberally providing for them, and believing that their interests were in friendly hands when in my charge, believing that the new clauses encroach upon no prerogative or function of the Board of Managers, I was surprised, thinking that I had served the homes and the Board of Managers patriotically, friendly, and in a liberal spirit, to find coming from here and there, from this quarter and from that quarter, intimations that I had recommended to my subcommittee and my full committee that the Soldiers' Home be placed in the unfriendly hands, as it was claimed, of the War Department.

Mr. Chairman, there are but few new clauses now pending in this bill. What are they? One requires that the treasurers of these homes shall give bond to the United States, instead of to the Board of Managers. Another simply requires that the Board of Managers, who now render their accounts and their estimates to the War Department, shall also, as a part and parcel of that transaction, render their annual report through the Secretary of War, instead of direct to the Speaker of this House, as now. What else? Simply that they shall render their accounts monthly, instead of quarterly, thereby saving, as the Second Auditor says, at least five months in the settlement of the accounts of this home.

What else remains? Simply that the law now compelling the managers to visit the home quarterly shall be repealed, so that they shall not be compelled to visit it four times a year, but leaving them at liberty to visit the home as often as they please. And that, Mr. Chairman, is the length and breadth of these two paragraphs. Yet as soon as the bill was reported to this House statements began to come to me from Grand Army posts and from newspapers, in which it was charged it had been attempted to put the Soldiers' Home and the managers into what they have called "the unfriendly hands of the War Department." When I have met a member of that board or a member of this House and shown to him and explained to him these paragraphs there is not one of them yet who has been able to show wherein a function or a particle of the dignity or the power of this Board of Managers has been encroached upon in the least.

Why, Mr. Chairman, when this Government is paying out more than three millions annually of the peoples' money in liberal disbursements to this home, is it unkind or unfriendly to require that the disbursing officers shall give bond to the United States instead of giving bond, as now, simply to the Board of Managers, where in a case of default, the Government has no power to sue on that bond and make the surety of that bond accountable.

Mr. LUCAS. I desire to ask the gentleman if the Board of Managers are required to give a bond?

Mr. COGSWELL. The treasurer is.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand the treasurer is, but what I ask is whether the Board itself gives a bond?

Mr. COGSWELL. I do not understand that the Board gives a bond. Now, let me say one word further with reference to these treasurers' bonds.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COGSWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. As I understand it, this is the position you take: that this section to which you are calling the attention of the House in no way interferes with the management of the soldiers' homes by the Board?

Mr. COGSWELL. Why, most certainly it does not. I would like anyone who opposes these paragraphs to point out a line or a word wherein they interfere with the functions of the Board of Managers. Speaking of the matter of the treasurers, all that is required by this paragraph is that a bond shall be given to the Government of the United States. We still leave with the Board of Managers the appointment and the removal of these treasurers.

Mr. SAYERS. I would like to ask my colleague a question. Can my colleague point out any difference between a pension agent who is required to give a bond to the United States, and the treasurer of one of these soldiers' homes? If a pension agent should be required to give a bond to the United States, why should not the treasurer of one of these homes, handling public money, be required to give bond?

Mr. COGSWELL. I was about to speak of that. There is not, except in this department, a dollar of the public money given to a disbursing officer who does not give a bond to the United States. Now, you take the different pension agents, over whom my friend from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] presided so admirably while he discharged the duties of Commissioner of Pensions—they rendered all their accounts direct to the officers of the Treasury.

Now, then, as I said a moment ago, these treasurers will still be appointed and removed by the Board of Managers. The War Department will have nothing to do with that. It is only required that these treasurers shall give bond direct to the Government for a proper accounting of the money that the Government gives them to disburse.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Will the gentleman allow me to call his attention to one matter?

Mr. COGSWELL. Yes.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I wish the gentleman would explain or tell us why this amendment should provide that the treasurers, etc., shall render their accounts monthly direct "to such bureau of the War Department as the Secretary of War may designate, and after examination, the fiscal accounts shall be passed to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury for settlement." Why not make them direct to the Treasury Department?

Mr. COGSWELL. It is to put them in line with all other bureaus or institutions disbursing public money.

Mr. DOCKERY. Except one.

Mr. COGSWELL. What one is that?

Mr. DOCKERY. There is only one exception to the rule invoked, and that is the Department of Justice. The accounts of marshals and attorneys, and the various clerks of the courts, go direct to the Auditor; but with the exception of the Department of Justice, as I now recall it, and this Board of Managers of soldiers' homes, all accounts of the Government are first reviewed, and properly so, by the administrative office with which they are connected. And, as I understand, this is simply to bring this one in line with the provisions of the laws that govern and control the auditing of such accounts in other departments.

Mr. BOWERS of California. You say this is in line with the accounting for other Departments?

Mr. COGSWELL. It is to prevent this present anomalous condition of not bonding these disbursing officers of the Government, and not requiring them to render their accounts for audit and examination direct to a Department; and as my colleague from Missouri suggests, it is to put these accounts in line and in accord with the accounts of other bureaus of this Government that expend public money.

Now these paragraphs provide for a thorough accounting and for the accounts to be sent directly to the War Department instead of to the Board of Managers for audit and then to the War Department.

Mr. DOCKERY. As the gentleman has well said—and I only desire to emphasize the point made by him—these accounts go there for audit; that is, for a preliminary review by the administrative branch, before they go to the auditing officers. Now, this provision in no wise trenches upon the administrative functions of the Board.

Mr. COGSWELL. Not in the least.

Mr. BOWERS of California. But that is not the rule now.

Mr. COGSWELL. No: the rule is that these accounts shall go to the Board of Managers for examination and audit, and from there be sent to the War Department. Now, the evidence before the committee was that this retards the settlement of these accounts some five months.

It is also, I would say, anomalous for a board which directs the disbursement of money to audit the same. Take the case of the Pension Office. The accounts of the pension agents are not sent to the Commissioner of Pensions for examination and audit, but are sent directly to the Treasury Department itself; and in this connection I will ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send to the desk.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECOND AUDITOR,
Washington, D. C., March 19, 1894.

SIR: In compliance with your request of the 17th instant, I have the honor to state that the accounts of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, to and including December 31, 1892, have been settled in this office and the settlement revised and confirmed by the honorable Second Comptroller. The accounts of the Home for the quarter ending March 31, 1893, have been stated and transmitted to the honorable Second Comptroller for his action, and the accounts for the quarter ending June 30, 1893, are under examination in this office. No vouchers showing expenditures made subsequent to June 30, 1893, have as yet been received from the War Department, through which all these accounts are forwarded.

The balances charged against the National Home, as shown by the books of this office, are as follows:

Support National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers:
No year	35,086.26
1891	13,974.49
1892, credit		$2,459.87
1893	1,401,086.09
1894	1,850,133.56
Branch Home, Marion, Ind	.25
Support State and Territorial homes:
1892	34,135.76
1893	413,561.75
1894	431,250.00
Total	4,149,828.86
Deduct credit	2,459.87
Balance	4,147,368.99

The above credit for 1892, arises from the fact that there is a discrepancy in the accounts of the Home as shown by the acting treasurer's accounts current and the books of this office. The unexpended balance for 1892 covered into the Treasury by the acting treasurer was larger than the balance for that year remaining in his hands as indicated by the books. This discrepancy is a technical one and the appropriations are properly adjusted by the Treasury Department.

Attention is invited to the fact that the account for the quarter ending March 31, 1893, which has been stated, will not be entered upon the books until passed upon by the Second Comptroller. As stated by this office, it shows expenditures allowed and suspensions removed amounting to $743,349.64.

In reply to your request for information whether in my judgment the provisions of the pending sundry civil appropriation bill requiring all disbursing officers to give bonds to the United States and render their accounts monthly and relieving the Board of Managers from auditing the accounts of the treasurer will facilitate and expedite the settlement of the accounts in this office, I have to say that in my opinion such change in the existing course of procedure will serve to materially expedite their settlement. Under the present system of rendering the accounts at least a quarter's accounts of the several branches must be treated together. The rendering of accounts monthly by each disbursing officer would save two months' time in taking up the accounts in this office, and would obviate the congested condition due to necessarily treating so large an account as a whole. Its division among the branches and rendering monthly would tend to many smaller settlements and a steady run of accounts before both the accounting offices.

The provision relieving the Board of Managers from the auditing of the accounts, will result in still further expediting settlements and reducing the large balances charged against the Home. The actual time during which the vouchers are held for examination and revision by the acting treasurer is not definitely known to this office, as the accounts do not reach here directly, but are first subjected to examination in the War Department. It would appear, however, that such accounts are held by the Home about three months. The accounts for the quarter ending June 30, 1893, were not received at this office until February 21, 1894.

The changes proposed by the two sections referred to should result in advancing the settlement of the accounts five months at least, and it is hoped they could be brought still nearer the current date. The balance charged against the Home as a whole would in consequence be reduced by from a million and a quarter to a million and a half dollars, and instead of one large balance there would be a number of small ones, each covered by separate bond to the United States.

Respectfully yours,

T. STOBO FARROW, Auditor.

Hon. JOSEPH D. SAYERS,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. COGSWELL. I desire to call attention to this letter from the Second Auditor, which has just been read, to say that the adoption of these paragraphs will expedite the settlement of these accounts at least five months, and I am inclined to think, holding in my hand, as I do, a protest from some soldiers' organization in Pittsburg, Pa., protesting against the proposed transfer, as they have been led to believe, of this home to the War Department. I am inclined to think that when these soldiers find out that they have been misled, and that these paragraphs are in the line of an honest attempt to expedite the settlement of the accounts of the home, to insist upon a more speedy and more responsible accounting, I am inclined to think they will transfer their indignation from this committee to those who have misinformed them on the subject.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not gone into this matter as elaborately as I would like to, but I want to call attention to the fact that by reason of the slow, tardy, and irregular methods of accounting now pursued, there is held up in the Auditor's office against this home over three-quarters of a million of dollars to-day, and there is still further an unsettled amount which is somewhere in the neighborhood of a million and a half of dollars.

As to what led the committee to propose these various clauses looking to better methods of accounting in that institution, let me state one or two facts. In previous bills we found an item under the heading "For outdoor relief and incidental expenses, $30,000." Now, what do gentleman think we found under that innocent caption? We found a salary of $4,000 for the president of the home as acting treasurer, and we found that of the whole amount under that heading, something less than $2,000 was for actual outdoor relief. Under the same heading we found the salaries of certain clerks in the president's office, etc.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman if it was Gen. Butler who drew that salary?

Mr. COGSWELL. No, sir; it was Gen. Franklin. Gen. Butler never drew any salary for his years of service as president of the home.

Mr. DOCKERY. Do I understand my colleague on the committee to say that under the item for "outdoor relief," the Board of Managers allowed the president a salary of $4,000 a year as treasurer?

Mr. COGSWELL. As acting treasurer.

Mr. DOCKERY. And such allowance was then made for the first time in the history of the home, as I understand the gentleman?

Mr. COGSWELL. Gen. Franklin was made president, and, as in the case of all other presidents preceding him, there was no salary attached to the office. Then they made him acting treasurer and give him $2,000. That ran along until three or four years ago, when they doubled the salary and made it $4,000.

We also found that an inspector-general, who was paid $2,500 for inspection, as was supposed, was in the president's office, doing the financial work there, or substantially a treasurer's duty.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not now criticising that particular salary, and perhaps I shall not. I am simply showing the investigation and consideration that the committee gave to this subject, by the fact that they found on investigation that under the item of "Outdoor relief and incidental expenses," $30,000 was appropriated, of which over $27,000 was for salaries; and this right in face of the law which requires that the money for salaries shall be specifically appropriated for. That is one of the improvements that the committee propose to introduce here. In this bill we specify what is for outdoor relief, what is for incidental expenses, what is for the salaries of the different officers of the home, and we provide that instead of beating around the bush by making the president acting treasurer, they may pay him $2,500 a year as president, but that he shall not be treasurer and have the disbursing and auditing of the money.

Mr. MARSH. Does not each home have a treasurer?

Mr. COGSWELL. Each branch home has a treasurer. Then we provide a competent salary for a treasurer, but say that he shall not perform the duties of president. And we also provide that no member of that Board except the president and the secretary shall draw a salary. We introduced that clause after ascertaining that the Board had, on some occasions, employed their own members and paid them counsel fees of three hundred or five hundred dollars, and for superintending certain constructions.

Mr. MARSH. Who received counsel fees?

Mr. COGSWELL. I do not care to say. Another thing that we have done is to require the Managers, when they get an appropriation for a certain purpose, to spend it for the purpose for which the appropriation is made, and for that alone. Why did we do that? We found that new barracks were estimated for in the Fifty-second Congress. The Committee on Appropriations did not see fit at that time to recommend an appropriation for the barracks, but what did we find when we examined the accounts of the home? We found that the barracks had been built. Where did they get the money? They took half of it from the appropriations for this, that, and the other items, and half out of the post fund, which is a private fund. Now, tell me who owns that barracks, the cost of which was taken half from the appropriations made in an appropriation bill, and the other half from the post fund?

These paragraphs are all in the interests of bettering the condition of these homes. They are no reflection at all upon the present Board of Managers. The members of the Board are all able, honorable men, distinguished soldiers of the late war, and the committee do not wish it understood for a moment that any reflection upon their integrity is intended. But the committee do say that there is necessity for a better system of accounting. There is necessity for a better method of disbursing this $3,000,000 of the people's money annually for this home, and we do insist that these paragraphs are improvements which will cause to be better administered this large sum of money, and thereby will effectually benefit the inmates of the home.

I am sorry that these paragraphs have been prejudiced by the unfair and untrue statement, which I hope I have now successfully refuted, that it is an attempt to put this institution (which is as dear to my heart as to the heart of any one of the managers) under the so-called "unfriendly control" of the War Department. Why, sir, the law already requires these officers to submit their estimates and accounts to the War Department. Is there any hostility in requiring them to send with their estimates and accounts their annual report, instead of sending it here, so that you may find the report where you find the estimates and the accounts? Is it any hostility to the managers or the inmates of this home to save five months in the settlement of these accounts, and relieve the Board of Managers from the auditing of their own expenditures, which Gen. Franklin himself says is a useless burden?

Oh! if this committee would only understand the purposes of these paragraphs and their merits it would not hesitate to adopt them. With the facts appearing before your committee they could not, as honorable and conscientious men, obliged to report to the House the best methods of taking care of this appropriation, do otherwise than they have done: and upon this statement, which can not be successfully contradicted, this Committee of the Whole can not do otherwise, it seems to me, than incorporate these paragraphs in the bill.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest to my colleague that there will be no trouble about the committee if the point of order is withdrawn. The committee will stand by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. COGSWELL. Talk about transferring this home to the War Department! I want to say it would be a good thing if the Board of Managers would read the existing law. Members of that Board who came before the committee did not know, until we pointed out the law, that they had to make their estimates to the War Department, and in apologizing for a certain branch treasurer they said they were obliged by law to appoint as treasurers disabled soldiers, forgetting, or not knowing, that for several years the disability clause has been stricken out by Congress, and that any Union soldier could be appointed to the position of treasurer. I say that when they undertake to talk about the law, their remarks should be taken with a little grain of caution. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois obtained the floor and said: Mr. Chairman, what length of time has been occupied by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL]?

The CHAIRMAN Twenty minutes.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I believe the gentleman has spoken without limit. I shall be obliged if the Committee of the Whole will extend to me a similar courtesy.

Mr. COGSWELL. I hope that will be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] asks that he be allowed to address the committee without limit. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I shall first address myself briefly to the point of order upon which this debate has arisen; and then for a little time by permission of the committee I will speak to the merits of the proposition under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that so far as the point of order is concerned his view is very clear as to what the ruling should be; and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] need not take up time discussing that point, unless he especially desires to do so.

Mr. SAYERS. Does the Chair sustain the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not ruled, but has simply intimated to the gentleman from Illinois that he need not address his remarks to the Chair on that point. The Chair has no desire to interfere with the arrangement or understanding in regard to the debate.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this home was organized as a corporation by an act of Congress passed in 1865. In 1866 the act of incorporation was amended, and all the corporate powers ordinarily enjoyed by a corporation were conferred upon this institution, including the power to take, hold, and dispose of real estate, to appoint its own officers, and generally to do all things that a corporate body may do.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Has this corporation the power to sue?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. It has the power to sue and be sued, to contract and be contracted with.

Among the things required of the Board of Managers of this institution were those specified by the section which this bill seeks to amend—the section providing that the Board of Managers shall make an annual report to Congress on the first Monday of every January, and requiring the Board to audit and examine the reports of its treasurer. This duty has been well performed; there has been no omission of the duty at any time.

Congress has dealt very munificently with this Board; it has given them during the past about $60,000,000, the appropriations being made from time to time as the growing army of invalids in the homes increased in number. Mr. Chairman, there has been no loss to the home of a dollar of money. A suit was brought upon the bond of the former president, Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, and a recovery had upon that suit; and the matter is now pending for final adjustment in the United States courts in the State of Massachusetts. One other suit has been brought—a suit against a recent treasurer in the State of Wisconsin for an amount aggregating perhaps as much as $300. These are all the legal steps that it has been necessary to adopt to protect in their integrity all of these enormous disbursements; and I think I may safely challenge the production of a similar record anywhere in the United States.

This statement, so far as the economics of the situation are concerned, will strike this committee more forcibly by means of the recital of three or four facts than by any amount of argument which I might indulge in.

There are to day in the War Department expenditures made upon its medical corps in the way of salaries and allowances, of $418,000 to pay for the medical attendance upon the Army of the United States, composed of a body of young and able men selected for their soundness and their fitness as soldiers. The medical attendance upon this body of men costs the Government of the United States in the way of salaries and allowances $418,000 per year. The attendance upon the National Home amounts in the course of a year to an average of 23,000—nearly as many men as there are in the regular Army.

Those men are distributed among seven national homes, every man presumably incapacitated for earning a living because of physical disability; and the average number of patients in the hospital, independent of invalids in the camps, is nearly 3,000 per annum, taken day by day through the entire year. Here then is an army of invalids; and, gentlemen, the medical attendance upon this whole army costs the Government of the United States in the way of salaries only $48,000. There are the figures of these two establishments to be contrasted with each other. An army of invalids under the management of this Board costs the Government for medical attendance less than $48,000; an army of sound men under the administration of the War Department costs the Government $418,000 a year. We object to increasing the possible expenditures for this invalid army by putting them in the charge of a department so much more expensive in its outfit than the one we are now conducting.

Mr. COGSWELL. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. In a moment—not now.

The home now under discussion is distinct entirely from the Military National Home of the United States, which has its station near Washington. This is the home for disabled volunteer soldiers; that is the National Home for soldiers of the regular Army. The average cost per annum of each inmate in the National Home (and no word of scandal, no word of accusation is raised against the management) is $417; while the total cost of each inmate of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers (excluding construction and repairs in both instances) averages only $143 per annum.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman allow me a word?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. SAYERS. From year to year there has been appropriated for outdoor relief and incidental expenses $30,000.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. By outdoor relief, as I understand, is meant that when an old soldier is found anywhere without the means to take him to one of the homes, the Board or any member of the Board may contribute out of this fund of $30,000 enough to take him to a home. Will the gentleman from Illinois state to this committee how much of this appropriation of $30,000 for outdoor relief and incidental expenses was actually used for outdoor relief, and how much for incidental expenses, and will he also state what those incidental expenses were?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I have not the exact figures before me; and I am not able to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. SAYERS. I will answer the question. The main purpose of this appropriation was for outdoor relief, that is, to help the old soldier along. But the Board did not use but a little more than a thousand dollars for outdoor relief.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. What was it used for?

Mr. SAYERS. The balance of the money was used to pay traveling expenses and salaries of members of the Board, or rather the salaries of the treasurer, secretary, and president of the Board. I believe you allowed him $5,000 a year.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Four thousand dollars a year.

Mr. SAYERS. Four thousand dollars a year.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Well, taking out that $6,000 paid to these two officers, the secretary and acting treasurer—not the president—that leaves $24,000.

Mr. SAYERS. How do you account for the remaining $24,000?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. We account for it upon vouchers that were sent in, in detail, approved in full by the Board itself.

Mr. SAYERS. Will the gentleman state to the committee for what purpose that sum of $24,000 was expended?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I am unable to tell you what it was expended for; but the vouchers on file in the Treasury Department show the expenditure of every cent of it.

Mr. SAYERS. Unquestionably. I do not doubt that.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Now, in regard to this matter——

Mr. COGSWELL. I have the figures. Will the gentleman let me read them?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes, read them.

Mr. COGSWELL (reading):

One treasurer, $4,000; one secretary, $2,000; one inspector-general, $3,000; two assistant inspectors-general, $5,000; four clerks in president's office, $4,300; three clerks for managers, $1,100; one messenger in president's office, $144; four agents, $2,460; one messenger for agents, $144; traveling expenses of managers and officers, $7,500; outdoor relief, $1,500; rent of offices, $1,042; stationery, expressage, etc., $750.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois, in view of that statement, which is correct, does he not think that Congress ought to regulate the method in which appropriations for incidental expenses are disbursed?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has prepared and submitted a bill which covers the various points that are mentioned in the memorandum just read by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL], and he allows in that bill, and the committee allow, the identical expenditures which have just been recited by way of explanation, except that the salaries of some of the officers have been reduced.

Mr. SAYERS. We reduce the salary of your president from $4,000 to $2,000.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. No, to $2,500; but the point that was sought to be made was that there was something mysterious——

Mr. SAYERS. Not at all.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois (continuing). Or improper about the expenditure of this money, which was appropriated for this identical purpose. In past years there may have been a combining of items. That is a criticism which applies to former committees, and not to the expenditure of these items by the Board themselves; and when the committee brought in this bill they believed, as they believe to-day, that all the items of the expenditures here recited were absolutely necessary for the management and conduct of this board.

Mr. COGSWELL. But not as you distributed it.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. You made a deduction in one instance, and you have struck out two officers, and I will speak of that presently. On page 81, in line 20, and on page 82, down to line 11, it will be found that the gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations have gone over these expenditures, and have adopted them and appropriated for them.

Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that a great fund of $3,000,000, to be distributed among twenty-nine different homes, located in different parts of the country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, can not be distributed without the incurrence of incidental expenses, that it can not be done without travel and the payment of traveling expenses; and to show that these gentlemen appreciate that fact, I need only to call the attention of the committee to the fact that on page 82 of the pending bill this committee proposes to allow for traveling expenses of the Board of Managers and other officers, $7,000, a saving of only $500 to the year's traveling expenses of the Board and its officers. The items are all right, Mr. Chairman. Now, it seems to me that the traveling expenses and other incidental expenses are such as would commend themselves not only to the Committee on Appropriations, but to every gentleman who understood the duties that were to be performed by the Board.

Now, turn to another point of saving which these gentlemen have proposed to make. They point to the fact that we had one inspector-general at $3,000, one at $2,500, whom they propose to strike out, and another at about the same sum. The gentleman whose salary it is proposed to strike out, Gen. Averill, of New York, is a man who has visited every State home, under the law, inspected every State home to see that the moneys of the Government voted by the last Congress were properly expended in the State homes, and that the State homes were properly complying with the requirements of Congress in the law enacted two years ago.

Mr COGSWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. COGSWELL. Of course it is for the Board of Managers to select which one of their two assistant inspectors-general they will drop; but the committee supposed that Gen. Averill would be retained, and that the inspector-general, who is now substantially doing the duty of the treasurer in the president's office, would be the one whose services as an inspector-general would be dispensed with, inasmuch as we appropriated $2,000 for a treasurer, instead of having the president act as the treasurer; and if they do, as I should think they would do, they will take this inspector-general and make him the treasurer, and give him the $2,000 that the bill allows, and not drop Gen. Averill, who is doing inspector's work, while the other one does not do inspector's work.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Supposing that to be true, where is the saving to the Government in changing the name of the officer? It is not to be found. But gentleman of the committee, in everything that relates to the good management of this Board, I believe it will compare favorably with any institution of the kind that has ever been established in the world.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] spoke of the fact that he was not unkindly toward the Board. I acquit him now of any such feeling. I can not conceive that there is reason for his having any such feeling, and therefore I believe that the feeling does not exist; but the reason that I, as a Representative upon this floor, oppose these pending amendments is, that the passage of these amendments will substantially transfer the affairs of this home to the War Department, and that is the point to which I shall speak.

As it is at present constituted and organized, the managers of the Board are all retired or recent volunteers Federal officers. They have a secretary, they have a treasurer, whose bond is given to the United States in the sum of $100,000. That bond is given by him to the Government, and is good for every dollar that is paid to him. The disbursements are made through the Treasury Department to the treasurer first of all, then by him the fund is given out, as the requisitions call for it, to the various treasurers in the several branches of the National Home, and each one of those treasurers gives a bond to the board of managers for the faithful disbursement of every dollar of this money. So that in this case, as perhaps in no other case in the history of the Government, there are two bonds provided in every case for the safety of every dollar that is disbursed under the appropriation.

The Board as at present constituted, gentlemen of the committee, is a board that is independent of any of the Departments. It reports, under existing law, directly to the Congress of the United States. It has been separated entirely from the operations of the War Department. Recently encroachments have been made, but for twenty-three years nearly of its career it made its reports right here; and in the very nature of the case there was an indisposition upon the part of the volunteer soldiers, who are entitled to the benefits of the homes, to be brought under the control of any other than their own former associates.

Now, there may be no good reason for the feeling upon the part of the members of that home that they should not be placed under the control of the Regular Army organization, but they have that feeling. There are 23,000 of them who are volunteers. They want to be under control of their own officers. As I have shown you, their affairs have been administered in the most economical manner, and in a most satisfactory manner; and unless there is good reason for it, they do not want to be put under the regular Army organization of the United States.

Mr. COGSWELL. If the gentleman will allow me, I wish he would explain——

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I want to go on a little farther, and then I will give the gentleman time.

Mr. COGSWELL. I do not wish any time. I wish you would explain the statement you have just made. You were unable to explain it in the committee, and you have been substantially where these paragraphs put you ever since 1875.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I will explain it. At this time, as I said before, Mr. Chairman, this Board of Managers make their report direct to the Congress of the United States. The pending measure provides that they shall render their accounts monthly, direct to such bureau of the War Department as the Secretary of War shall designate.

And the next paragraph pending provides that all laws and parts of laws that require the Board to audit and examine or authenticate the accounts of the homes and visit the homes quarterly, are hereby repealed. Then there are other parts of this bill, to which I have not taken exception, that provide for the inspection of these homes by the Inspector-General's Office of the War Department.

And now, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] tell me how it is justifiable to take away the rightful power to visit these homes and to inspect and audit the accounts of these treasurers; to transfer these treasurers' reports to a bureau of the War Department; to destroy the bonds that have been given by these treasurers to the homes, and require them to substitute others for the approval of the Secretary of War; how it is possible to take away the right of the Board to audit accounts and visit homes? I know very well what the gentleman's answer will be. I will wait for a moment at this point.

Mr. COGSWELL. There is nothing in these paragraphs that prevents the Board of Managers from exercising the most careful scrutiny over the expenditure of this money. You can call upon the treasurers for a financial statement at the end of every day if you want to.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Now, I will speak as to that point. The only power we have——

Mr. COGSWELL. I have not fully answered. The law compels you now to visit these homes four times a year. We take the compulsory part of the law out and permit you to visit them every week if you wish so to do.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Now, we will see about that. The power of this Board to audit the accounts of the treasurers is a power given it by statute. This law expressly repeals the power of the Board to audit a single account. That is done in line 24, page 84. The only power we have to examine the accounts of the treasurers is given by existing law. This bill expressly takes away that power. See line 24, on page 84, and lines 1 and 2 on page 85 of the pending bill. The only power that this Board has to authenticate the accounts of its treasurer, the man who receives the money from the Government under a $100,000 bond, is given by the statutes. This bill takes away that power in lines 1 and 2 on page 85. The only right that the Board of Managers has to visit one of these homes as a board, and to have its expenses borne upon such investigation, is a power given by section 4834 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. COGSWELL. Will the gentleman allow me there?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. In one moment. That power is expressly repealed by the first line on page 85.

Mr. COGSWELL. Does the gentleman mean to say that the Board of Managers, put in charge of a home with several branches, has not the inherent power to visit the home and its branches?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I do.

Mr. COGSWELL. Do you mean to say that when you get $7,000 for the purpose of traveling on visits to this home and its branches that you have no power to visit them?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I say that exactly. I am not twisting any language when I say that the only power that this Board has to visit these homes, as a Board, and inspect them, was the power given in section 4834 of the Revised Statutes; and you take it all away. I can imagine myself, as a member of that Board, presenting its accounts for the expenses of a visit to Hampton or Togas, or anywhere else, to some critical clerk in the Treasury Department, and being met with the question, "Where is the statute that authorizes you to make this expenditure? That statute, gentlemen, was repealed by the act of 1894." There is no answer to that.

Mr. COGSWELL. When you are given $7,000 in that bill for that very purpose?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. It is not given for that purpose.

Mr. COGSWELL. Is there not a provision there for traveling expenses of $7,000?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. No, sir. You are mistaken as to the phraseology. It is "for traveling expenses of the Board of Managers and their officers, $7,000."

Mr. COGSWELL. Exactly.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Now, then, when you take away the power to visit and take away the duty to visit, you thereby take away the right to make a single voucher for the expenses.

Mr. COGSWELL. You may amend the provision so as to make it as plain as you desire; but I think it wholly unnecessary.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I do not want to amend it. I think the language is couched on the idea that the Board of Managers was to be destroyed as the controlling officials, and that there should be substituted therefor an officer of the Inspector-General's Office.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That they should retire into innocuous desuetude.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. That they should retire into innocuous desuetude. Thank you, sir. That is appropriate.

The part of this bill to which I desire to call attention at this time, in order to make clear the point I have made, and to which I have no objection at all, is on page 85, line 15:

> That hereafter, once in each fiscal year, the Secretary of War shall cause a thorough inspection to be made of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, its records, disbursements, management, discipline, and condition, such inspection to be made by an officer of the Inspector-General's Department, who shall report thereon in writing, and said report shall be transmitted to Congress at the first session thereafter.

So that in the very law that repealed the right of the Board of Management to visit these Homes, there is another section of the law providing for an inspection by an officer of the Inspector-General's Office. So that in the very law in which the recital is made of the traveling expenses of the Board of Managers, another officer is provided for. It is in the face of the act repealing the only law that allowed them to make quarterly visits for inspection; and no means of visiting these homes is left to the Board except they pay their own expenses, and they have nothing allowed them whatever with which to pay those expenses except this amount mentioned here.

Mr. COGSWELL. Seven thousand dollars.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Why do you provide for an inspection by an officer provided by the War Department? I do not object to that. I am not standing here to put obstacles in the way of the most thorough and radical inspection of the homes; but if you want to remove the Board of Management from its control, this is the legislation that will do it. If you want to remove the power of inspecting these homes from the Board of Managers, this is the legislation that will do it. And if, after they are removed, and the right of inspection, except at their own expense, has gone, you want to provide for control by the War Department, this is the legislation that will do it.

Now, then, if the Congress of the United States shall desire at any time to change the management of these homes and to put them under other control, let a bill be brought in for that purpose, and let it be fought fully and manfully out on the floor of this House. But to report a measure on an appropriation bill which takes away all the powers of the Board of Managers is to do by indirection that which should only be done by the American Congress directly, openly, and honestly.

Now, as having to do with the management of these homes, I want to say that the passage of the law as it stands here is in effect to transfer all this great corporation, with all its power, from the Board of Management, and from the control of Congress, into the hands of the War Department. Every dollar of the money that is voted by the Congress of the United States for these homes is to-day, under existing law and regulations, four times inspected.

I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] to that statement, and if I am misinformed he will correct me. I say that every dollar of the money that is voted to these homes is four times audited. First, every dollar of it is audited by the Board. It is charged with that duty. Three men are generally detailed at each branch to examine the matters. They are examined by taking up the vouchers and comparing them with the ledger accounts of the treasurers. That is number one. Number two is this: Duplicates of the vouchers are sent to the general treasurer's office in Hartford, and there all the time they are patiently at work going carefully through them, auditing and examining every account to the smallest sum.

Mr. COGSWELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois (continuing). The third audit is this. These accounts to-day are transmitted through the War Department, under this restrictive legislation to which I have referred, to the Second Auditor, and are there examined as every other account is examined. So that that makes three audits. And the fourth examination is made in the Comptroller's Office, where they are finally allowed or disallowed. So that there are four separate and distinct examinations of these accounts before their final passage and allowance.

Mr. COGSWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him there?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. COGSWELL. It is the purpose of one of these paragraphs to do away with the audit which is made by the Board of Managers auditing their own accounts and their own disbursements. Now, let us see how these accounts are audited by the Board of Managers. I have here the record of a meeting of this Board. It met in Boston on the 18th. It then met on the 20th, a day's journey away, at Portland. Assuming that they came together in the morning, or at noon of the 20th, I find that on motion the accounts of the Eastern Branch from March 31, 1890, to March 31, 1893, were examined that afternoon, found to be correct, reported, and approved by the Board. What kind of an auditing is that which will go through three years' accounts of one of those homes in an afternoon? I want to say it is quite evident that it was merely pro forma and perfunctory.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I will tell the gentleman. The account is audited in this way. The vouchers have been carefully kept and prepared by the treasurer and are there in their exact numerical order. His ledger is spread open. The accounts are taken up, number by number, one member of the Board sitting there to call the name and the amount, and the other to examine the voucher to see that it is for the correct amount and is properly signed and is for a proper expenditure, and in that way the three or four hundred vouchers that go to make up a quarter's expenditure are all examined.

Mr. COGSWELL. You do not want me to tell you how the accounts were at Togus, do you?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. No, I do not care for that.

Mr. COGSWELL. I do not want to, but I can. [Laughter].

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Does the gentleman mean to say that any fault is to be found with the accounts at Togus?

Mr. COGSWELL. With the methods of keeping them.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Was not the money all accounted for?

Mr. COGSWELL. It was accounted for, about one-fifth of it, in memorandum checks and duebills.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. To whom were the checks given?

Mr. COGSWELL. It was not cash, at any rate.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. They were just the same as cash. I did not pass upon that account and I do not know about it in detail, but I know that every dollar of the money was accounted for properly and will pass the audit of the Treasury when it is reached. You say that suppose you are about to throw the Board of Managers out of this audit, you have left the three other safeguards, but I say that even a superficial examination by the Board of Managers is better than no examination at all, and that if we are going to be responsible for the expenditure of this money we have the duty laid upon us, and it is our right to examine the vouchers and accounts; yet you propose in this bill to take away our right to audit those accounts.

Mr. COGSWELL. No.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Why not? What do you mean, then?

Mr. COGSWELL. I mean to say that these treasurers are under your control, that the inspector-general is under your control, and that you can have a daily inspection of those accounts and vouchers if you desire.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois (reading):

> And all laws or parts of laws that require the Board to audit and examine or authenticate the accounts of the treasurer and visit the home quarterly are hereby repealed.

That is what you propose to do.

Mr. COGSWELL. We propose to do away with this audit because the Second Auditor says that it delays these accounts five months, and because when you do come together and audit these accounts it does not amount to anything, when in an afternoon you can examine three years' vouchers and accounts.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I want to call the gentleman's attention to a lamentable error of fact into which he has fallen. These accounts that we examine are the retained accounts, and in the meantime the originals have gone to the War Department, so that their audit there is not retarded for an hour by our audit.

Mr. COGSWELL. Then, if that is so, you send the accounts to the War Department before you audit them?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. We send one set of accounts to the War Department and another set is retained. So that your point is not correct.

Mr. COGSWELL. Do they pass in the Treasury Department upon the unaudited accounts that you send them, or upon the audited ones that you send them later?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. We send the Treasurer, through the War Department, one set of these vouchers, and they are audited. The set that goes to Gen. Franklin as treasurer and the set that goes to the War Department and the set that is retained are exact copies of each other. The point the gentleman was making was that by doing away with this audit by the Board he would expedite the settlement of the accounts. Now, I tell him that he would not expedite it one-half minute, for the reason I have stated. Yet it is proposed here to take away our power so that we shall not know what is done by our own officials. Now, it seems to me utterly idle to have a Board of Managers and to continue them in nominal control, while at the same time you remove from them the right of inspecting and auditing the accounts of the institution, and put in control the Inspector-General's Office of the War Department. It amounts to a transfer; it was meant to bring about a transfer, even if my friend was not a party to that intention.

Mr. SAYERS. Does my friend mean to say that any other member of the committee could be a party to it without the gentleman from Massachusetts being one?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I have followed that point as far as I desire to.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to understand the gentleman. I do not wish an innuendo or intimation.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I have indulged in no innuendo or intimation. I state what results necessarily from the proposed legislation. That is all. The thought of an innuendo or intimation is not in the case at all. I state that if this proposed legislation is enacted, then this Board of Managers becomes a perfunctory organization and had better be dispensed with at once, for their real duties will devolve upon an official of the War Department, or on the bureau chief that he may designate to perform them.

Mr. SAYERS. That is not the language to which I object.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I will withdraw any language that the gentleman from Texas objects to if he thinks it has any personal bearing on him, for I did not so intend it or think it.

Mr. SAYERS. I do not refer to myself more than to any other member of the committee.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. If you will have recited the exact language used, you will find that it bears no such construction and never was intended to bear any such construction. What I have said and what I repeat, is that, according to my best judgment, if you enact this amendment into law you destroy the power of the Board and instate the War Department fully in control of these homes, and that in the light of what I have already said, you do it without any considerations of economy or of wise policy, and without any demand on the part of the inmates of the homes for any change. Let me say in closing, Mr. Chairman, that there are not to-day upon the face of the earth 23,000 old men better cared for, better housed, or more heartily in accord with those who are charged with their management, than the 23,000 men who are now under the control of the Board of Managers of this Home.

No man among them has asked that this transfer be made. When the Board of Managers speak in their presence they come to us as old men come to their chosen guardians, to those having charge of their interests, they come to us with their little stories, with their little troubles, with their little distresses, they seek us and talk to us as plainly and as pleasantly as gentlemen sit down and talk together. There is no rudeness about them, there is no discourtesy. There is nothing of the awful surrounding the Board of Managers. It is a body of gentlemen who intend to discharge their duties to those who are committed to their charge without partiality, favor, or affection, and with the highest regard to proper economy; and when I show you again finally that the War Department requires $418,000 per annum for its expenditure for medical attendance for 25,000 well men, while we expend in all the homes but $48,000 for similar attendance for an army of invalids; when I show you that this home here, which stands upon the hill and which we all admire, which has existed since 1855, is conducted under the regular Army management at an expense of $217 per man per annum, while our homes are conducted at an expense of $143 per man, I think I have shown beyond question that this transfer can not be made on the ground of economy.

I say again, Mr. Chairman, in closing, that if the Congress of the United States shall desire to disrupt this organization, to call it to the bar for offenses, to charge it with dereliction of duty, there is a way in which that can be done, and an hour when such accusations can be heard. But to undertake to do this by saddling upon an appropriation bill destructive provisions is not fair to this home, is not fair to the country.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], a member of the subcommittee who prepared this bill, desires to address the Committee of the Whole. I ask the gentleman how long?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think I shall not want more than ten minutes—probably not that much.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask consent that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed to address the Committee of the Whole without limit.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in the preparation of this bill the chairman of the subcommittee, Governor SAYERS, very properly assigned the soldiers' home items to the gentleman from Massachusetts, Gen. COGSWELL, first on account of his experience, he having been for many years upon the committee that prepared this bill; second, on account of his intelligence as a legislator; and third, because he is not only a statesman of experience, but was a gallant soldier in the volunteer army in the late war. So that from every standpoint he seemed to be well equipped to do this service without prejudice and for the best interests of the homes.

Now, I must confess, after listening to my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BLACK], that while he has said much with which I am heartily in sympathy touching the desirability of good management for these soldiers' homes, and while I accept also the statement that the management has been good, I am not in sympathy at all with the assumption that anybody connected with this House or any of its committees has thought favorably for a moment of transferring the management of the soldiers' homes directly or indirectly from the managers as they are now constituted under the law. The gentleman sets up a man of straw and then says, "Because I have set up a man of straw, I will now knock him down."

After the gentleman from Massachusetts made his report to the subcommittee and then to the full committee, I gave this matter the closest and best examination and study that I was able to devote to it; and in a few minutes let me state what I understand the situation to be:

In 1865 or 1866 the law was enacted establishing these soldiers' homes and giving the management to certain managers, some chosen by the House of Representatives, some by the Senate, including also the President, the Secretary of War, and the Chief Justice. Gen. Butler was chiefly in command of these institutions for many, many years. The money appropriated by Congress for these institutions went for many years into the hands of the managers, who bought the homes, made the improvements, made the payments for subsistence, ordered the expenditure of the money, and audited the accounts, all within themselves.

There was no reporting to anybody, except the annual report to Congress. The matter ran along in this way for many years, and in my judgment with honest and intelligent management. But the system was faulty, and it got the management into trouble. It naturally would do so. When you give to any set of men the power to spend money, and not only to spend money but to audit the expenditures, to have the matter all within themselves and report to nobody except to Congress, naturally with this great power of expending and auditing they are liable to get into trouble.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Is it not true that under the existing law these accounts are all audited at the Treasury Department?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am coming to that.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. That is true?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am coming to that in a moment.

Now, Gen. Butler being at the head of this Board, got into lawsuits that lasted longer than his life. I am glad to believe that his expenditures were proper. He never would have gotten into those troubles and those lawsuits if there had been a rigid monthly accounting, and if that accounting had been made by the Treasury Department. The matter ran along for many years; and finally, upon an appropriation bill like this, Congress required that those accounts should be audited at the Treasury Department; and since that time they have been so audited.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Will my colleague allow a suggestion?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I know my colleague means to be very fair about this matter.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I want to be exactly fair about it.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. At the time Gen. Butler was president of the Board and its acting treasurer, the amounts involved were all very small relatively.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. At the time he ceased to act in that capacity they had not grown to be large. And another thing I would like to suggest is that he reported every cent of his expenditures to the Speaker of the House.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, he made report as the law originally provided, which substantially amounted to nothing—at least to but very little.

Now, the inherent defect in this law originally was allowing the same power that spent the money to make the final audit. In other words, the members of this Board were supreme from beginning to end; and being vigilant and honest, and proud to give good service, as I have no doubt they were, and as I have no doubt Gen. Butler was, still he got into litigation, as I have said, that lasted him up to the end of his life, and is not yet, as I understand, fully determined. Gen. Butler served all those years without compensation. He went out of the management. Gen. Cogswell, when he came to make his report to the committee, had the accounts examined so far as practicable, looked into the matter as fully as he could, more fully than any committee of the House, I dare say, had ever done, and he came to the conclusion that the position of manager of the soldiers' homes should be largely an honorary one, if not entirely so. We found that the president of the home was getting $2,000 as president and $2,000 as acting treasurer.

Mr. COGSWELL. No, first $2,000 as acting treasurer, and afterward $4,000 as acting treasurer.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I understand that my colleague withdraws the statement that there were two salaries paid to one officer.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I did not mean to make the statement in that way.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. That is all right.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will withdraw it if I was in error, of course. This officer was getting $4,000 as acting treasurer. Gen. Butler served for nothing. Now I am not criticising that allowance. Up to two years ago the president of this home received $2,000, and two years ago the allowance was increased to $4,000.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Now, will the gentleman allow me a remark in that spirit of entire fairness which, as I understand, actuates us all?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Gen. Franklin has given bond for the receipt and disbursement of this $3,000,000 of money. He has served entirely without compensation, except so far as the Board made an allowance to him recently in the amount mentioned by the gentleman—$4,000. He was once the superintendent of the Colts Arms Company, a great corporation in which he drew I know not how great a salary; but in recent years he has devoted himself entirely to the business of the home. As president he maintains his business office in Hartford, traveling to every national home in the United States. He spends his whole time substantially in the discharge of his duties. Now I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to say whether he believes that an allowance of $4,000 to any man for the responsible disbursement of nearly $3,000,000 among these various homes with their 23,000 men—doing, besides, all the duty of a supervising and commanding officer—is excessive. I ask the gentleman to answer that in all fairness.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me to complete my statement and will get out of his head the idea that Gen. Franklin or anybody else is to be attacked and will understand that I am speaking of a system of managing and accounting, we shall get along better.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Well, I will not interrupt the gentleman further——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to the interruption, but the gentleman seems——

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Just answer that question, if you please.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman seems a little bit like the Irishman at Donnybrook Fair; he is looking for somebody to tread on the tail of his coat. Now, nobody is wanting to tread on the tail of any manager s coat.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I have asked the gentleman to answer that question as a matter of fair judgment.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will answer your question in my own way.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. All right.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Gen. Butler did not receive compensation; Gen Franklin was receiving $2,000; afterwards he was voted $4,000 as acting treasurer. Now, I am not here to say that he ought not to receive some compensation. We inquired into that matter; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] recommended that a salary, not of $4,000, but $2,500, be allowed him, not as acting treasurer but as president of this Board. We believed that this Board which spends the money should not audit the accounts.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me one other question——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will, if the gentleman will let me answer that first. I will answer all the gentleman's questions. Therefore we put a clause which I believe is still here, that prohibits a treasurer being appointed from any one of this Board of Managers. We propose to make them go outside and get a treasurer, and therefore as we took the duties of treasurer from Gen. Franklin and left him only the duties of the president, it was entirely proper, as Gen. COGSWELL thought, and the full committee agreed with him, that his salary should be fixed at $2,500 as executive officer.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Now I want to ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. All right.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Your statement of the work of the committee is, that finding Gen. Franklin president and acting treasurer, with a salary of $4,000, you chose to divide the offices. No one objects to that. That part of your bill passes unchallenged; but in dividing the offices you created a separate one. You allowed $2,500 to the president, and propose to give $2,000 to the treasurer, increasing the expense thereby $500 for the two offices. No one objected to that. I ask if it is not a fair inference from that that the committee thought the discharge of the duty of these two offices was worth $4,000, instead of the $4,000 which we were paying?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, if he will get it into his head once for all that the merits of this proposed legislation do not stand upon the individual merits of any one of this Board of Managers, but that we are seeking to get a proper method of expenditure and accounting for the soldiers' homes, why then we can discuss this matter more intelligently.

Now, to proceed, we found that in some instances the Board of Managers had employed individual members of the Board to perform various duties, one I recollect being paid as high as $2,000 to superintend the erection of a home or barracks. And so it was in many instances we found services had been performed by individual members of the Board of Managers, and then the Board of Managers paid them.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. The gentleman does not mean to be unfair——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will wait until I conclude my statement, I do not believe he will think I am unfair. I am not saying that it is not worth $2,000 to superintend the building of a home or barracks.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Where was that?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not recollect.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman to name the instance he speaks of, where a member of the Board was employed at $2,000.

Mr. COGSWELL. Milwaukee was the home and Wolcott was the man.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Was not that under Gen. Butler's administration?

Mr. COGSWELL. I do not know.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Years and years ago, before any member of the present Board was in office; and I never before heard of this incident that the gentleman speaks of. It may be true.

Mr. COGSWELL. There are cases where we have paid $300 and $150 for counsel fees; and if the gentleman wants to know the name of that party, I can give it.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I know the name of the party.

Mr. COGSWELL. I know you do, very well.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Yes, very well. Have you any other instances?

Mr. COGSWELL. No.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, the gentleman seems to rest under the impression that this legislation is proposed as a criticism against individuals.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Not at all. I beg your pardon.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I merely said on the report of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] that in some instances these employment had been made, and I presume properly made. At least they had the power to make them, and their brother members of the Board had the power to audit the vouchers. Now, we did not think that was a good practice; and without criticising anybody, we concluded that we would report a provision, under the recommendation of Gen. COGSWELL, that would place it out of the power of Board of Managers, directly or indirectly, to employ any manager in the service of the homes—that practice virtually makes the Managers both employer and employé—except to pay $2,500 to their president to act as executive officer, and $2,000 to their secretary, who is also a member of the Board.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Was there any objection made, parliamentarily or otherwise, to the enactment of that amendment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, no; that amendment has gone into this bill and has been approved by the Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. And no one objected.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And let me say to the gentleman that I think most of the material amendments have been accepted by the Committee of the Whole House without objection so far as we have heard here, at least many of them. I will not take the time to read them. I am telling what we found and what we recommended, on the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL].

We found another thing; that we believed it wise that some officer, not depending upon this Board of Managers, should once a year examine the accounts and examine the homes; some independent force outside of the Board, somebody that the Board did not create. So we provided that an officer from the Inspector-General s Office of the War Department should once a year make this examination and inspection.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I will ask my friend if that has been objected to?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly not; but can not my friend allow me to say what amendments have been reported, and what have gone on, and the reasons for their going on?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. If I irritate the gentleman by interrupting him, I will not do it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Not at all.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Then I want to let the gentleman understand fairly that the things he has suggested as desirable have been confessed by me.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly, and when the gentleman says they have been confessed by him, that is all right. He objects now to two provisions that are not particularly valuable. The valuable provisions have already been written into this bill.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I am very glad to hear you say so.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The valuable provisions have been already written into this bill; but before this bill was considered a great outcry was made that here was a proposition that would take the control of the seven branch homes—I believe there are seven all told——

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. There is one corporate name covering all.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes; but I believe there are seven altogether.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That here was a proposition that would take the control of these homes away from the Board of Managers, and put them under the Secretary of War. I thought I knew the practice of the Government touching accountings. I thought I knew what the legislation was, and when gentlemen came to me about it I said there was no such intention; and then, when I read the provisions, I said there was no such provision, and that statement I now reiterate.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Is the provision beginning with line 17, on page 83, to the close of line 2, on page 84, a change of existing law?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes, in part.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Is not the change embodied in the part from line 16, on page 84, to line 2, on page 85, a change of existing law?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes, it is a modification of existing law.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Then it is really a change?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly, not to play upon words.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I understand that there is a point of order made.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not arguing the point of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. But is not the point of order pending?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. That is all I desire to ask.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Let me say to the gentleman from Indiana that after the intimation of the Chair that he did not desire to hear me on the point of order, I replied simply to the strictures made by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. So that we have now in the body of this bill, favorably accepted by this House, various provisions received, and the most valuable of which is that no member of the Board of Managers shall receive employment at the hands of the Board, for compensation, except the president and secretary.

Second, that these homes shall be examined every year by an officer from the office of the inspector-general, and a full examination made.

The third of these, the "posthumous fund," that has heretofore been a floating fund in the hands of the Board of Managers, shall be carried to the credit of one of the items of appropriation and utilized for the support of the homes, and shall be made good hereafter from moneys appropriated by Congress as it is called for.

Mr. MARSH. Will you state what this "posthumous fund" is?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Is it not true that that provision of the proposed law is not resisted here?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly that is true.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. One other question. Is it true that the committee appointed by the Board of Managers recommended this identical disposition of this money?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not know that that is true as to that.

Mr. COGSWELL. What is that?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The "posthumous fund" amendment. My recollection is that the Managers did recommend it.

Mr. COGSWELL. They did not.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And the gentleman from Massachusetts says they did not.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. But that was not my question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, this is the point the gentleman objects to and makes his point of order on:

That all disbursing officers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers shall, before entering upon their duties, give good and sufficient bonds to the United States, in such sums as the Secretary of War may direct, faithfully to account for all public moneys and property which they may receive. They shall render their accounts monthly, direct to such bureau of the War Department as the Secretary of War may designate, and, after examination there, the fiscal accounts shall be passed to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury for settlement.

That is one clause that the gentleman objects to. What is the condition now?

There is a treasurer at $2,000 a year. Then every one of these seven branch homes has a treasurer at $2,000 a year. These treasurers at the branch homes give their bonds to the Board of Managers, not to the United States, and they might default. The Board of Managers can make a compromise, and the United States will be powerless to intervene in the event of the default of any one of these seven branch treasurers. We furnish the money. Why should not these treasurers, in taking the money of the United States, provided by Congress, to be paid out on the order of this Board of Managers, give a bond to the United States, which furnishes the money, giving the United States power, in the event of default, to make the Government whole? I do not know of any reason.

Ah, but, says my friend, that interferes with the Board of Managers! It does interfere with the Board of Managers in so far as a compromise or a release of these seven treasurers might be concerned, in the event of their default. But now let me say to my colleague from Illinois and to the members of the committee, under the law as we propose to amend it, these appropriations as made, every dollar of them, goes into the hands of these bonded officers of the United States, giving bonds to the United States, if that provision is complied with.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Let me finish this statement and I will. But there is not one dollar or one cent of it that can ever be paid out by anybody, except upon the authority of the Board of Managers. That Board of Managers, under the law as we propose to make it, has the authority, figuratively speaking, to make the genial rain descend upon and to support all those homes. If they do not exercise that authority under the law as it now is and as we propose it shall be, then not one cent nor one dollar of this money can be expended. Nor is there anything in this proposed amendment in connection with the law anywhere that in the slightest degree takes away from the plenary power of the Board of Managers to expend this money.

Then, what does it do? It merely says that when the Board of Managers has ordered this money to be paid out it shall be paid by these bonded officers of the United States; and if they fail to pay, then the United States has got its remedy. The United States has not got its remedy now under the law as it is. But, says my friend, the power to audit these accounts is taken from the Board of Managers and given first to the War Department and then to the Treasury Department of the United States, and tears the power of the Board of Managers up by the roots. Now, if my friend had studied the methods of expenditure and auditing of this Government he never would have made that criticism, because the truth is the Post-Office Department, the Interior Department, the Indian Office, the very Pension Office that my friend from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] presided over so honorably for four years in its great expenditures, reaching up towards a hundred million dollars a year, the money was paid—how? The certificate was issued, the orders were made by the Interior Department; but the money was paid by a bonded officer of the United States, the pension agent, and his accounts did not come back to my friend to audit. They went to the Treasury Department to be audited; and so it is all through the public service, and so it ought to be everywhere when the United States furnishes the money. While the Government of the United States may trust the Commissioner of Pensions, may trust the Secretary of War, may trust the Board of Managers, and give them the broadest discretion to expend money and order its expenditure, the payment of that money and the auditing of those accounts should be in another branch of the Government.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that they are audited there now, and I will ask also if they are not fully audited?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, let us see about that.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I ask the gentleman if they are not audited as fully as any other accounts?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Wherein do they lack?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It is just wherein they lack that I am going to tell my friend. The proposed amendment provides that all these bonded officers of the United States shall render monthly accountings: that they shall go to the proper bureau of the War Department, and then be transmitted to the Treasury, which looks toward a complete audit.

Why, in the present auditing there are between four and five million dollars of accounts of the Board of Managers that never have been audited by the Treasury Department; and for almost twelve months, if I recollect the reading of the letter of the Second Auditor accurately, there have been no such reports as would enable the Second Auditor to make the audits. These accounts will in the end, I presume, be audited. We want a more speedy audit. We have expended the money, or your Board of Managers have had authority to expend it, and we want these treasurers to make out and render their accounts.

The joint commission of which the gentlemen from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY] and from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] are members, is seeking to devise legislation for a more speedy auditing of accounts that should apply to all the Departments, although the present system is more speedy by far than the law touching the auditing of the accounts of the Board of Managers.

Now let me go a step further.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I wish while the gentleman is on that branch of the subject to ask him a question. You do not understand that there has been a neglect in the certification of vouchers to between four and five million dollars?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is what I understand from the reading of that letter—that there are between four and five million dollars of accounts which are not audited.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. That simply means that the auditor has not gotten through with the auditing; but he has the accounts and the vouchers.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not know.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Oh, yes; read his letters.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I read the letter very carefully; and he said in that letter that if this provision of law was enacted that he could make these settlements in a speedy manner.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question for information. I understood, as I suppose the House understood, from your remarks that the money intrusted by the Board of Managers to these treasurers is not managed in such a manner as to be safe, and if the accounting is done in the right way, they should give a bond to the United States. Is it not true that there is a treasurer of the corporation who does give a bond to the amount of a hundred thousand dollars; and are not the subtreasurers at these other homes responsible to him, and he responsible for them to the Government?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I would say that I understand that the acting treasurer heretofore has given a bond to the United States in the sum of $100,000. The gentleman says, I do not know as to that. But I make answer to that——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Is he not——

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman wants to both ask and answer the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; I do not.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I ask the gentleman's pardon. The treasurers of the branch homes have heretofore given bond to the Board of Managers, and they will continue to so give bond unless we enact this legislation. Now we provide for a general treasurer, this disbursing officer, who manages the other seven disbursing officers——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not think the gentleman understood my question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think I understood the gentleman's question very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My question was whether the treasurer was under bond, whether he was not responsible to the Government for these subtreasurers?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, well, the treasurer was under bond to the United States in the sum of $100,000 and yet he was disbursing $3,000,000; and that is practically no security without a vigilant administration and speedy auditing of the accounts.

The only efficient check, as in the case of all our disbursing officers, is not in the amount of the bond, but is in the vigorous administration and the monthly accounting.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If your statements are correct, then, instead of this kind of legislation on an appropriation bill, ought we not to have a separate bill and have the whole subject overhauled?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There is so much that ought to be done and so little time to do it that unless such errors of administration and accounting as these are corrected in connection with the provisions appropriating for the service there will not be any correction at all.

Mr. NORTHWAY. The reason I asked the question was this. We new members, who have not investigated this subject, are troubled to know just what we ought to do. If you introduce a special bill upon the subject, then we shall have the time and the opportunity to investigate and consider it. We want to do what is right, but we do not just know what is right.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, it has been discussed for some time, and it is in the power of gentlemen to read. If they will read a little, they will get at the truth of the matter.

One other clause that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] objects to is this:

> That the Board of Managers shall make an annual report of the condition of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers to the Secretary of War, to be submitted by him with his annual report to Congress at the commencement of each regular session thereof.

The gentleman says that is very wicked. Why? They have got to make the annual report to Congress now; this merely places the report among the reports from the War Department, so that everybody can get it and read it. There are not twenty men in this House who knew a week ago that this Board of Managers of National Homes reported directly to Congress. Men by the dozen have come to me and asked me where they could find out something about it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that there is not a man on the Board of Managers that is not as honest and straight as any man in this country. I know them all and they are gentlemen whose honesty and integrity can not be questioned, here or elsewhere.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is very true and very conclusive and about as logical as anything that has been said in opposition to this proposed legislation.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Will my friend yield to me a moment?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will not yield to anybody until I complete the reading of this provision:

> And all laws or parts of laws that require the Board to audit and examine or authenticate the accounts of the treasurer and visit the home quarterly are hereby repealed.

The gentleman strikes an attitude and says that that is vital. Now, what is the existing law? The law provides that this Board of Managers shall every three months visit these homes. Complaint was made that that provision of law was onerous and unnecessarily expensive, and therefore we provided that they should not be compelled to visit these homes quarterly. The gentleman says that this provision repeals their authority to visit. Not so. The authority inheres in them, because as this is a corporation they, as its managers, have the power to visit it when they choose, and it is their duty to do so, and this very repealing act itself permits them (if they required any permission), because it says that they shall not be required to visit quarterly. Then, to make assurance doubly sure, the very bill that we propose to enact appropriates $7,000 to pay the expenses of visitation.

Mr. STOCKDALE. How much did the visitation cost before?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. About the same amount.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Can they charge and receive pay for doing that which the law does not require them to do? Will the Secretary of War or any other official approve their vouchers for expenses or mileage?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I do not think they receive any mileage now.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then, will the auditing officials approve their vouchers for expenses for something that they are not legally required to do?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman had paid as close attention to me as I think I was perhaps entitled to receive, it would not have been necessary for him to ask that question.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I have listened attentively to every word you have said.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I have talked in vain if the gentleman has not understood my position on that point.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Well, I may not be the one to blame for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will state again that the very fact of this being a corporation and having a board of managers implies the right and the duty of that board to manage.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But you do not answer my question.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am very unfortunate, indeed, if I have not made some slight answer to the gentleman's question. Secondly, I tell him that the very language of this act implies necessarily that this Board shall have the right to visit.

Mr. NORTHWAY. But is it obligatory on them to visit?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Then, if it is not obligatory, can they charge and receive compensation for doing it?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly. And I tell my friend that we appropriate here $7,000—within a few dollars of what they expended last year—to pay the expenses of visitation. If the law were silent everywhere else, that is sufficient of itself.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. You are mistaken about the phraseology.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] a question in good faith.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Very well.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I would like the gentleman to tell us (because there are a good many of us who are not well informed about this matter) what emergency or necessity has arisen for changing the law in respect to this management?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have been talking, I think, about twenty-five minutes——

Mr. BOWERS of California. And I have listened to every word.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman has not discovered from what I have already said the necessity for changing the law, then it will do no good for me to go over the matter again.

Mr. BOWERS of California. That is a very discreet answer.

Mr. PICKLER. I would like to ask what will be the duties of this regular army officer, this inspector? Will he pass upon the accounts? Will the Board be allowed to make only such expenditures as he approves?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say with great respect that if we could organize a kindergarten school here to teach the manner in which expenditures are made and audited, it would be a great benefit to some gentlemen.

Mr. PICKLER. I hope the gentleman will answer my inquiry. We want to get at the facts. I simply ask what are to be the duties of this inspector, and whether the Board of Managers will be allowed to make only such expenditures and for such purposes as this inspector may approve.

Mr. COGSWELL. He has nothing to do with that matter.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman from South Dakota had read the existing law and the provisions of this bill, he never would have asked that question.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman from Massachusetts (and I believe the committee are in earnest about this thing) says that this provision does not contemplate any transfer to the War Department. The gentleman from Illinois, who I believe has an equal interest in this matter, declares that the provision does practically make a transfer of this institution to the War Department. Now, if it does so, I am for one opposed to it; if it does not, that is another question. Here is a wide difference between the gentlemen. I am trying to get at the truth of the matter. And I would like to know what will be the duties of this inspector so far as the accounts are concerned?

Mr. COGSWELL. So far as the administration of the home and the accounts are concerned, nothing.

Mr. PICKLER. Then what does he inspect?

Mr. COGSWELL. He is simply to go and inspect, and then report to Congress what he finds.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the Board have the same authority with reference to expenditures and the purposes for which expenditures are made as they have now?

Mr. COGSWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Completely and fully.

Now, let me say, in conclusion, that I indorse the views of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL], in the recommendation which he has made and which the full committee has adopted. I believe that in the interest of good legislation and good administration this recommendation should receive the approval of the House. I will go farther and say that the provisions embodied in the bill, to which some gentlemen have objected, and the provisions now offered as amendments, which are far less important than those inserted in the bill, are simply an effort in the direction of sound administration, and are not liable to the criticism that some wicked people have been trying to discriminate against these homes and put them under the control of a wicked Secretary of War; for, in truth and in fact, the powers of the Board of Managers were plenary before these amendments, are plenary now, and will be plenary after the amendments are adopted.

The only interference with the existing law is with the view of insuring under all circumstances a prompt and honest account of the expenditures made under the authority of this Board.

Mr. COGSWELL. I will ask my colleague on the committee whether it is not true that in the committee a suggestion to put this Board under the War Department was unanimously disapproved.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Certainly. Such a thing was never intended—never thought of.

Mr. SIMPSON obtained the floor and said: I understand that the chairman of the committee wants to make a motion that the committee rise. If I can obtain ten or fifteen minutes in the morning, I will gladly give way.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that debate upon the clause now under consideration and amendments thereto, and also upon the clause to which the other point of order has been raised by the gentleman from Illinois, and amendments thereto, be closed in thirty minutes. When this request is acted on, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. REED. Does that include the paragraph moved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]?

Mr. COGSWELL. No. Time will be asked for that purpose also.

Mr. REED. Then that is all right.

Mr. SAYERS. That is not provided for yet; but I will say that just as soon as we dispose of this question, it is my intention to ask unanimous consent that thirty minutes be allowed to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY], twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], fifteen minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], and fifteen minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD]. I will make that request now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's request is first that debate on these paragraphs be closed ——

Mr. COGSWELL. In half an hour.

The CHAIRMAN. In half an hour.

Mr. SAYERS. That thirty minutes be allowed upon the pending paragraphs and amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that debate on the two paragraphs under consideration and amendments thereto close in half an hour. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, I ask further unanimous consent that thirty minutes be allowed the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY], that twenty minutes be allowed the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and that fifteen minutes be allowed the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], and fifteen minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD], after these two paragraphs and amendments have been disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. On the bill generally?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; on the bill generally?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks unanimous consent that after the disposal of the matters under consideration thirty minutes be allowed to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY]; twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]; fifteen minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], and fifteen minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] to discuss the matter generally. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], who has been unavoidably absent from the House, be recognized and allowed ten minutes in which to speak upon the pending paragraphs in the morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The request is that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] be allowed ten minutes on the pending paragraphs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LESTER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to the Committee on Agriculture to sit during the sessions of the House.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PEFFER, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (S. 115) for the development and encouragement of silk culture in the United States under the supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1170) to establish an electrical experiment station for the purpose of investigating and determining whether electricity can be profitably applied as a motive power in the propulsion of farm machinery and implements, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Mines and Mining, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1515) to amend chapter 6 of Title XXXII of the Revised Statutes, relating to mineral lands and mining resources, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MILLS, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 200) for the relief of Moses Pendergrass, of Missouri, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 199) for the relief of E. R. Shipley, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 571) to provide a postal-card letter, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 751) to provide a postal currency, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. KYLE. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. HUNTON, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 886) for the relief of legal representatives of John Wightman, deceased, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. VOORHEES. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to say that so far as the Republican members of the Committee on Finance are concerned they did not object to the reporting of the bill, while they are opposed not only to the proposed income tax, but to the many changes of specifics to ad valorems, and to the great bulk of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. I ask that the bill be printed and placed upon the Calendar, and I give notice that on the 2d day of April, which is a week from next Monday, I shall call the bill up for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, whether there is to be any written report with the bill?

Mr. VOORHEES. There is not.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will there be any statement submitted by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. VOORHEES. There will be when the bill is called up for consideration.

Mr. MANDERSON. A statement that will show the changes which are proposed in the existing law?

Mr. VOORHEES. There will be full statements and explanations of the bill when it is called up for consideration.

Mr. MANDERSON. And those will be ready in print on the 2d day of April?

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not say that, or in what form they will be made. I myself expect, for instance, to make a statement to the Senate when the bill is called up for consideration. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that there will be comparative statements which will be accessible to the Senator, showing the changes which are proposed to be made in the existing law. All those usual sources of information will be amply afforded in a very short time.

Mr. MANDERSON. I make this inquiry because of the fact, recognized by all, that the many changes in the bill from specific to ad valorem duties require an expert to show exactly what changes are proposed in the law. I think such a document as has been referred to, either in the nature of a statement by some expert familiar with tariff duties or a report from the committee, should be printed and in the hands of Senators some days before the bill is taken up for consideration.

Mr. VOORHEES. All that information will be speedily afforded to the Senate and to Senators.

Mr. MANDERSON. I hope it may.

Mr. McPHERSON. Mr. President, a single word perhaps will be proper and appropriate from me upon this occasion.

I have assented to the report just made by the chairman of the committee, justifying my action by the belief that whether wise or unwise in all its provisions it is the best compromise obtainable in a committee differing widely in their views upon economic questions and in the effect upon the prosperity of the country when embodied in our statute laws.

I shall find no difficulty in supporting in the Senate my colleagues with whom I have served upon the committee in enacting into law so much of the proposed legislation as will yield to the Government all the revenue needed when economically administered. Beyond this just and proper limit I must not be expected to go.

In view of the fact that two subjects of legislation proposed in the bill had received much public attention, I will announce to the Senate, as I have already stated to the committee, my views and purpose as to each of them. Firstly, I disagree with my colleagues upon the committee upon that section of the bill which provides for an income tax; ample provision having been otherwise made in the bill for revenue, its presence here is unnecessary, and besides it is un-American, un-Democratic, and, as I think, unwise. I shall move at the proper time to strike this provision from the bill.

Secondly, I disagree with my colleagues on the committee in respect to the sugar schedule as it appears in the bill; and I shall feel impelled to offer at the proper time an amendment to this schedule, believing that the option to impose duties upon sugar either by the polariscope test or a Dutch standard of color, as the customs officers may elect, is a dangerous power to confer upon any Government officer, and its effects will prove confusing and misleading when applied in practice. I trust, however, that the committee upon further consideration will adopt this view and offer an amendment which will confine the test of all sugar, raw and refined, to the polariscope test alone, and thus make certain and definite the duties each shall pay.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it would be a convenience to have a pamphlet print of the bill with the present law stated in each paragraph and then the proposed changes. First, the changes proposed by the House of Representatives, and, secondly, the modifications proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance. It seems to me that would be a great convenience.

Mr. VOORHEES. Will the Senator be kind enough to speak this way? I did not hear what he said.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it would be a great convenience to Senators to have a pamphlet print of the bill, embracing, first, the existing law as respects these paragraphs; secondly, the changes in the paragraph proposed by the bill as it came to us from the other House——

Mr. VOORHEES. That is what I have already stated.

Mr. ALLISON. And, thirdly, the changes proposed by the Senate Committee on Finance. Has the Senator suggested that a print of that character shall be made?

Mr. VOORHEES. Yes; with an index.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. That I think would be a wise order to have made.

Mr. VOORHEES. Is the Senator making a point on the form or the substance of the publication? Does he wish to have it in a different form from the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. I think it might be well to have it in a convenient pamphlet form.

Mr. VOORHEES. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that we can adjust that in committee. There will be no trouble about fixing that.

Mr. ALLISON. But it will be necessary to have an order of the Senate, I think.

Mr. VOORHEES. There will be subheadings also in the bill, so that it will be easy of reference.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. HOAR. Has the proposition made by the Senator from Iowa been adopted? I thought the Senator made a motion or a suggestion equivalent to a motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from Indiana to assent to the proposition.

Mr. HOAR. Has the Senate assented to it?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No motion was made and no request was submitted for the Chair to put to the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I did not understand precisely what was done. I should like to know whether that matter is disposed of?

Mr. FRYE. It can not be done without an order of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. So I stated.

Mr. VOORHEES. I think the matter can be very safely left to the Senator from Iowa and myself, for we shall fix it up most likely exactly as he wants it.

Mr. FRYE. It can not be done without an order of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. No; it can not be done without an order of the Senate.

Mr. VOORHEES. I differ from the Senator. We have done a great many things of that kind already without an order of the Senate. The committee itself has power to do that.

Mr. HOAR. I do not myself exactly understand (I do not know that it is important it should be understood now) what is the parliamentary attitude of the bill. I understand the Senator from Indiana to report the bill, and then if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], as he undertook to do, represents the Republican members of the committee, and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] has been correctly understood in regard to the income tax and the sugar schedule, here is a bill reported from a committee in regard to which in two of its great, perhaps its greatest, single features a majority of the committee who are said to report the bill are opposed. Now, does that make a parliamentary report? The Senator from New Jersey is opposed to two great sections of the bill. I do not understand how the committee can be said to have agreed to this report.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not understand that there was any disagreement in committee as to the reporting of the bill this morning. I heard no objection to its being reported. I think I am telling no committee secret. It was ordered to be reported by general assent, as I supposed. I want to say to the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. The Senator will pardon me, that I may make my statement plain. I supposed that a committee ordinarily report bills they are in favor of and not bills they are opposed to.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not wish to get into any discussion on any collateral subjects this morning upon the bill. The time will come when I think I can convince the Senator from Massachusetts that I have acted exactly in a proper manner in respect to this subject.

Mr. HOAR. I made no criticism on the Senator from New Jersey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts, that the bill was reported by the chairman of the Committee on Finance and it has been placed on the Calendar. The Chair did not understand the Senator from Iowa to ask unanimous consent, and for that reason the Chair did not submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. PEFFER. Referring to the tariff bill which has been reported, I desire to give notice that when it is called up at the time named by the Senator from Indiana I shall move to substitute for it the bill which I introduced last week, being the bill (S. 1762) to amend the customs laws and to provide additional revenue for the support of Government, and for other purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 1918) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Calcasieu and Sabine Rivers in the States of Louisiana and Texas.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 123) authorizing the wearing of a distinctive badge adopted by the Regular Army and Navy Union upon all occasions of ceremony; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 4831) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a high wagon bridge at or near Sioux City, Iowa," approved March 2, 1889, as amended by acts of April 30, 1890, and February 7, 1893; and

A bill (H. R. 5425) for the charter of the Iowa and Nebraska Pontoon Bridge Company.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1795) to aid in the erection of a monument to the Maryland heroes of the Revolutionary war; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1796) removing the charge of desertion against Philip Bradley, late of Company F, Seventy-second New York Volunteer Infantry; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1797) for the relief of Miss Mary Henry Carroll, sister of Miss Anna Ella Carroll, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLEN. Yesterday I submitted an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill, the amendment proposing to make an appropriation of $16,000 for a resurvey of the lands of Grant and Hooker Counties, in the State of Nebraska; and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that reference, and have the amendment referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that change of reference will be made.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. GIBSON. I move that the bill (S. 1680) to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

FENDERS ON DISTRICT STREET RAILWAY CARS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be directed to investigate and report, as promptly as may be, whether in their opinion the street railways of the city of Washington, propelled by cable and electric power, have adopted and are using the most effective fenders for the protection of human life and limb, and if they are not using the best available appliances what remedy should be invoked to compel them to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to submit an editorial article from the Evening Star of last evening bearing on this question, which I ask to have referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the paper will be so referred.

INTRODUCTION OF REINDEER INTO ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the last report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon the "Introduction of domesticated reindeer into the district of Alaska."

REPEAL OF FEDERAL ELECTION LAWS.

Mr. CHANDLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the sum of $52.92, being the expense of printing 2,000 extra copies of Senate Report No. 113, part 2, be paid from the appropriation for the contingent expenses of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs, or any subcommittee thereof, have power to employ a stenographer to report hearings in connection with Senate bill 1586, "to ratify and confirm an agreement with the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache tribes of Indians in Oklahoma Territory, and to make appropriation for carrying the same into effect;" the compensation of said stenographer to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers properly approved by the chairman of said committee.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 123) authorizing the wearing of a distinctive badge adopted by the Regular Army and Navy Union upon all occasions of ceremony was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

POLICY REGARDING HAWAII.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed, in accordance with the notice I gave yesterday, with my remarks upon the resolution on the Hawaiian question reported by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE] from the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. TURPIE. Will the Senator from Mississippi permit me to have the resolution read for the purpose of fixing a time for its consideration?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution, reported by Mr. TURPIE from the Committee on Foreign Relations January 23, 1894, as follows:

Resolved, That from the facts and papers laid before the Senate it is unwise and inexpedient, under existing conditions, to consider at this time any project of annexation of the Hawaiian territory to the United States; that the Provisional Government therein having been duly recognized, the highest international interests require that it shall pursue its own line of policy. Foreign intervention in the political affairs of these islands will be regarded as an act unfriendly to the Government of the United States.

Mr. TURPIE. It will be recollected that at the time when the resolution was reported the committee asked for its immediate consideration. Present consideration has been much belated, and I think the resolution has been a reasonable time at least before the Senate. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it be made the special order for Tuesday next immediately after the routine morning business.

Mr. DOLPH. I object.

Mr. PLATT. What day does the Senator from Indiana propose?

Mr. TURPIE. Tuesday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. DOLPH. There is objection. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. TURPIE. Then I should like to have some agreement as to the time when a vote shall be taken and when the debate upon the resolution shall close. I will remark to the Senator from Oregon that the resolution was by the committee at least held to relate to the external view of our policy; it does not relate to the mooted questions that have been debated here, and early action in regard to it is certainly advisable. There is no need of the pendency of the resolution here as a subject-matter for debate upon such questions as have been debated in the course of the argument. The original resolution of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] is on the table, and the question of concurring or nonconcurring in the report made by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations is yet on the table. Both those papers contain a full basis for complete debate upon the whole subject without reference to the resolution which I now ask be made a special order. I call the attention of the Senator from Oregon to the expediency at least of fixing a time—if next Tuesday is not the proper time—when the resolution shall be made a special order.

Mr. DOLPH. I am not myself prepared to agree to any time. As is well known, I did not favor the report of the resolution as it was made, and after the interpretation which has been placed upon the first clause of the resolution by a member of the committee, I understand that other members of the committee who at the time agreed to the report are not willing to stand by the favorable report. I think the resolution should be recommitted, so that we may know how the committee stands upon it, and if it is not in shape to satisfy the majority of the committee, it should be put in that shape. I therefore can not agree this morning to any time for its final disposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 832) to simplify the form of deeds of conveyance, trust, and releases of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask the attention of the Senate with some reluctance upon a question which has been very fully debated, but there are some aspects of that question to which I have given attention, and I have reached conclusions which I believe it my duty to state to the Senate.

The necessity for an investigation by Mr. Cleveland of the Hawaiian revolution, so called, will appear evident from a consideration of the documents and papers accessible to him when the investigation was ordered. In the statement of facts connected with this revolution I shall confine myself to the facts as shown by the documents then in existence. These papers show that on Saturday, 14th day of January, 1893, the Legislature of the Kingdom of Hawaii was in session in accordance with the constitution, and that in pursuance of the undoubted power of the Queen it was duly prorogued.

They also show that on the same day the Queen, under pressure from her native subjects, proposed to promulgate a new constitution; that this proposed action was opposed by her cabinet, and that she finally desisted, temporarily, as is alleged, from that attempt.

A meeting was held on the same day, in the back room of a lawyer's office, to take action in reference to this proposed promulgation. The meeting at which there could have been present only a small number of persons, probably not more than two dozen, appointed what they called a committee of safety composed of thirteen persons "to consider the situation and devise ways and means for the maintenance of the public peace and the protection of life and property."

The committee called a mass meeting of the citizens of Honolulu, to be convened on Monday, the 16th, at 2 o'clock p. m., which was duly organized and addressed by the leading spirits in opposition to the Queen.

In the mean time the Queen had issued a proclamation, countersigned by her cabinet, in which she promised to take no further steps in the promulgation.

The chairman of this meeting on taking the chair made a short address, in which he stated—I quote literally:

We do not meet as revolutionists, but as peaceful citizens who have a right to meet and state their grievances.

Another speaker, the leading spirit of the movement, Mr. Thurston, said:

The constitution gives us the right to assemble peaceably and express our grievances. We are here to-day, doing that, without arms.

The resolutions adopted by the meeting did not even remotely indicate any revolutionary movement. They denounced the action of the Queen in relation to the promulgation, and confirmed the powers of the committee of safety.

On that same day the committee of safety applied, as Mr. Stevens says in his report, "to me [him] for aid." The paper making the application thus referred to by Mr. Stevens as accompanying his report is not found with it, nor in the documents above referred to. For some purpose it was omitted. Mr. Stevens reports that on reception of this application he "promptly addressed a letter to Capt. Wiltse, requesting the landing of the troops, and the marines from the Boston were promptly landed."

He further reports, as next in chronological order to the landing of the troops, that "as soon as practicable a provisional government was formed," and that this committee of safety "forthwith took possession of the government building, archives, and the treasury, and installed the Provisional Government at the heads of the different departments. This being accomplished, I promptly recognized the Provisional Government as the Government of the Hawaiian Islands."

The account given by the commissioners of the Provisional Government, to the United States, differs essentially from this, in that it says the call for troops was made by many citizens, a fact not alluded to by Mr. Stevens, and necessarily contradicted by what he did say. The commissioners' account also differs materially from Stevens's, in that it states that no public recognition of the Provisional Government took place "until after the abdication of the Queen and the surrender to the Provisional Government of her forces."

The Secretary of State, Mr. Foster, in his letter to the President adopted the view of the commissioners on this subject.

It appears from these same papers, however, that Stevens's statement was correct on this point, and that the recognition took place while the Queen's forces were in full possession of the police station house, which Mr. Stevens had in a previous letter indicated as the most important military stronghold in the city of Honolulu, in fact so important, as he stated it, that its possession actually commanded the royal palace and the government building. There were also unaccountable differences in these documents in reference to the location of the troops. Mr. Foster says in his letter referring to the troops:

They were distributed that night—

After the landing—

between the legation and the consulate, where they occupied the inner courts and a private hall rented for their accommodation.

According to his statement, when the troops were landed they were put alone at the consulate and the legation, at which particular places they occupied the inner courts and a private hall rented for their accommodation, but Capt. Wiltse in his report stated, as will be found on page 27 of Senate Executive Document 76, Fifty-second Congress, second session, as follows:

One detachment of marines was placed at the legation and one at the consulate, while the main body of men, with two pieces of artillery, were quartered in a hall of central location near the government building.

It also appeared that President Dole in his letter to Mr. Smith, the resident minister of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States, informed that official that this remarkable revolution took place in the manner described, in his own language, as follows:

That by public proclamation made on the 19th instant, from the government building, in all formal style—

Whatever that may be—the Hawaiian monarchy was abrogated, and a Provisional Government over the Hawaiian Islands was established.

This history is very remarkable up to this point—a revolution by proclamation—commenced forthwith on and consummated eventually by the landing of the United States troops, who, however, it was avowed, took no part in producing the result.

But still more remarkable facts appear from these papers, which need now to be noted.

They are that Minister Stevens, though an avowed annexationist and a bitter enemy of the Queen, had in letters to the Secretary of State prior to these events distinctly stated that there were not men enough opposed to the Queen either to overthrow her Government or to maintain a government, if one were established for them. This fact was confirmed in the letter of the Hawaiian commissioners sent to the United States to make a treaty of annexation. In this letter they stated explicitly "there was no longer any possibility of efficiently and permanently maintaining the public peace and the protection of life, liberty, and property in Hawaii under the existing system of government, and that the only method of maintaining such permanent peace and security was by securing the assistance and support of the Government of the United States, or of some foreign power, possessed of sufficient force to prevent the future possibility of revolution or despotic assumption of power in derogation of the rights of the people."

This confessed inability to maintain a proper government by the Provisional Government, thus concurred in by Mr. Stevens, was as a fact placed beyond all controversy by the application of the Provisional Government on the 1st of February, just twelve days after it was established, for the United States troops on shore to protect it. In that application the Provisional Government confessed its inability to be a government at all in that it was wholly unable to perform the first and most essential functions and duties of government. As their application is very material, I shall read it:

SIR: Believing that we are unable to satisfactorily protect life and property and to prevent civil disorders in Honolulu and throughout the Hawaiian Islands, we hereby, in obedience to the instructions of the advisory council, pray that you will raise the flag of the United States for the protection of the Hawaiian Islands for the time being, and to that end we hereby confer upon the Government of the United States, through you, freedom of occupation of the public buildings of this Government and of the soil of this country, so far as may be necessary for the exercise of such protection, but not interfering with the administration of public affairs by this Government.

We have, etc.,

SANFORD B. DOLE,
President of the Provisional Government of the Hawaiian Islands and Minister of Foreign Affairs.
J. A. KING,
Minister of Interior.
P. C. JONES,
Minister of Finance.
WILLIAM O. SMITH,
Attorney-General.

His Excellency JOHN L. STEVENS,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

The further fact appeared that the landing of the troops of the United States, or even their presence in the harbor, had always the effect both of overawing the people and the Government of Hawaii. I shall read an extract on that subject. On November 9, 1892, Capt. Wiltse, then commanding the United States steamship Boston in Honolulu, wrote a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, the last sentence of which is as follows:

I am informed from reliable sources that the Queen had been strongly advised to dissolve the Legislature and order a new election, which would have been unconstitutional, and which would probably have caused a revolution; but she was deterred by the presence of United States vessels of war.

And Mr. Stevens himself reported in his letter before noted that it was a fortunate thing that at the time of these transactions the Boston was in the harbor, and that the landing of the troops "promptly gave immediate relief to the public anxiety."

These and many other facts not needed now to be mentioned, shown in the papers then before Mr. Cleveland, brought into serious question, if they did not absolutely overthrow the statements made by Secretary Foster and others, that the landing of the troops had no effect on the result of the movement to overthrow the Queen.

Besides this the official papers before alluded to showed that the Queen surrendered under a written protest in which she averred that she surrendered to the superior power of the United States, that she appealed to the United States to do her justice in the matter, and that the Provisional Government received the surrender under this protest.

I shall read that protest. The Queen says:

I, Liliuokalani, by the grace of God and under the constitution of the Hawaiian Kingdom, Queen, do hereby solemnly protest against any and all acts done against myself and the constitutional Government of the Hawaiian Kingdom by certain persons claiming to have established a Provisional Government of and for this Kingdom.

That I yield to the superior force of the United States of America, whose minister plenipotentiary, His Excellency John L. Stevens, has caused United States troops to be landed at Honolulu and declared that he would support the said Provisional Government.

Now, to avoid any collision of armed forces and perhaps the loss of life, I do, under this protest, and impelled by said force, yield my authority until such time as the Government of the United States shall, upon the facts being presented to it, undo the action of its representative and reinstate me in the authority which I claim as the constitutional sovereign of the Hawaiian Islands.

Under these circumstances, and with these facts disclosed in the official records of the Government, it was most clearly the duty of the President, with a treaty of annexation then pending, to investigate fully the situation.

The foregoing facts show the necessity for investigation. They also show the necessity for somewhat enlarged powers on the part of the person making the investigation.

The President could not certainly know, though he must have suspected strongly, that Stevens had abused his powers and had materially aided the revolution.

The President did know that in the opinion of the commissioners, Thurston and others, sent to treat with the United States for the transfer to the United States of the sovereignty of the islands, the Provisional Government was not only unsafe and unstable, but could not be made a safe and stable government, with efficiency to secure permanent peace and safety without the support of some strong foreign government, and that they had put this forward as the main ground for annexation to the United States, and that Stevens concurred in this view. He knew that martial law had been proclaimed, and that a protectorate was then in existence under the patronage of Stevens.

Under these circumstances, to send a special commissioner, with power to investigate, but without power to make the investigation complete, would be not only futile, but an act of extreme folly.

The necessity and the duty to investigate, to inquire, has been shown, and the power to do so by an agent or commissioner not confirmed by the Senate is not disputed. Yet as illustrating my argument, I will cite some of the instances of the exercise of the power through the appointment of private, special, or informal agents during the session of the Senate without the advice of the Senate.

I note only a few of them, and the first one I note in order to meet that aspect of the objection made against Mr. Cleveland's action that he appointed Mr. Blount as his special commissioner, as if he were the autocrat of this country, and as if Blount were his private representative, which has been criticised as an assumption of autocratic power by the President, is one which shows that George Washington, as early as the 13th of October, 1789, the very year in which he was inaugurated, appointed Gouverneur Morris his private agent, not a public agent, to make certain inquiries of the British cabinet concerning the disposition of that cabinet to carry out the treaty of commerce which had been made between the United States and Great Britain.

So, if Mr. Cleveland is chargeable with having assumed somewhat autocratic power in appointing Mr. Blount as his special agent, he has the example of the Father of His Country, who appointed Gouverneur Morris as his private agent.

The other cases to which I refer consist of an appointment made by Mr. Madison in April, 1815, when Augustus Neale during the recess of Congress was appointed a special agent to proceed to Halifax to ascertain the number, names, and situation of negroes carried off by British officers.

Another, Joseph Devereaux, appointed during a recess of Congress by Mr. Madison as special agent to obtain information of the various occurrences in South America interesting in a political point of view to the United States of all military movements in that quarter, of the relative force of the contending parties, disposition manifested by all toward the United States, and the changes which may take place in their commercial regulations as applicable to us.

Another by Mr. Monroe April 18, 1820, when Alexander McRae was appointed during a session of Congress special agent to proceed to any place where a European congress may be held, with a view to the consideration of the affairs of Spain and South America. He was to report all such information relating to the proceedings of such congress as he might deem useful to the Government of the United States, etc.

Another was on December 15, 1823, by Mr. Monroe, when Luther Bradish was appointed during a session of Congress agent to collect such information in foreign countries in relation to the commerce of the United States as might prove useful to them. He was particularly directed to report whether the interests of the United States would be promoted by a treaty of amity and commerce with the Sublime Porte, and the best way to accomplish the same.

Another, April 21, 1824, by Mr. Monroe, when Thomas M. Mann was appointed during a session of Congress informal agent to obtain information relating to the state and prospects of Guatemala, whether they promise the establishment of its separate and independent existence, etc.

Another, December 7, 1825, John Quincy Adams being President, when Thomas Bolling Robertson was appointed during a session of Congress confidential, political, and commercial agent to Cuba, to report on the state of the population, exhibiting the relative numbers of the various castes, their disposition towards each other, education, etc., condition of agriculture and extent, commerce, state of political parties and their views with regard to a continuance of the existing connection with Spain, or in favor of independence, etc., the Spanish means of resistance, moral and military; in short, all information tending to the formation of a correct estimate of the value of the island, its resources, its capacity to maintain its independence, etc.

Another, March 15, 1854, when Franklin Pierce was President, when Charles W. Davis was appointed during a session of Congress special agent to ascertain whether the Africanization of Cuba was in contemplation by Spain.

Another, May 12, 1856, when Mr. Pierce was President, when Amos B. Corwin was appointed special agent to make a thorough investigation into the recent assault upon citizens of the United States and the robbery and destruction of their property at Panama.

These all show that from the very beginning the power during the session of the Senate to appoint persons to make investigations was exercised, and has never been disputed.

The power to investigate carries with it the power to make the investigation full, thorough, and complete. The investigator should have all the powers necessary to discharge fully his commission.

There are no lame and no impotent powers granted by the Constitution. They are always plenary and ample to accomplish the full purpose of each power. The President had a high and solemn duty to perform, the highest of all possible duties of a mere earthly character, to wit, the duty:

First. To decide rightly a question which had been referred to the United States, by the Queen's protest, which had been accepted by the Provisional Government, to wit: Her right to restoration, coming from an alleged and apparently justly alleged improper dethronement by the unlawful use of the United States forces.

Second. He had a further duty, to decide whether this new government, proposing to transfer the sovereignty of the islands to the United States, had the rightful power to do so, and especially whether the United States were in such a position as to authorize them to accept such transfer.

Third. The honor and fairness and good faith of the Government were involved. They called for a full investigation. The rights and happiness of a friendly, though weak, people were also involved. This consideration demanded that the whole truth should be known. There were serious obstacles in the way—an absolute government controlling by law a weak people, denying the right and duty to investigate, a United States minister strongly suspected of being an accomplice in the alleged wrong.

Under these circumstances the power to investigate necessarily carried with it the power to protect the investigator and the witnesses from whom information was to be sought, and the power to inspect and search the archives of the American legation. There must needs be a power paramount to the power of him whose conduct was to be investigated. Now, the power given to Mr. Blount was simply a power to investigate. The subsidiary powers granted were needful to make the investigation complete. They were also plainly intended to be this, and no more.

The President's letter of credence states distinctly the object of Mr. Blount's mission. He was to visit the Hawaiian Islands and make report to the President concerning the present status of affairs in that country; and then President Dole is informed in the letter that Mr. Blount's authority in all matters affecting relations with the Government of the Hawaiian Islands is paramount.

Letters of credence are always in general terms. Specific authorities and specific limitations of authority are generally found in letters of instructions. In this case they were so found, and manifestly for a proper reason, that the Provisional Government was not to be allowed to determine for Mr. Blount the extent to which his subsidiary powers to aid investigation should be carried. So far as that Government was concerned, Mr. Blount was to have the powers he assumed. So far as Mr. Blount and the United States were concerned he was to assume no power not needed for the investigation.

The instructions to Mr. Blount stated:

> You will investigate and fully report to the President all the facts you can learn respecting the condition of affairs in the Hawaiian Islands, the cause of the revolution by which the Queen's Government was overthrown, the sentiment of the people toward existing authority, and in general, all that can fully enlighten the President touching the subject of your mission.

This fully states the object and purpose of Mr. Blount's mission. Then comes in the next sentence the powers of Blount, as follows:

> To enable you to fulfill this charge, your authority in all matters touching the relations of this Government to the existing or other government of the Hawaiian Islands, and the protection of our citizens therein, is paramount and in you alone, acting in coöperation with the commander of the naval forces, is vested full discretion and power to determine when such forces shall be landed and withdrawn.

It will not be disputed that this additional power could have been conferred if Mr. Blount had been confirmed by the Senate.

We have seen the precedents, and they are full and specific as to acts of investigation. But there are many precedents which justify appointments of special agents for other specific diplomatic purposes than investigation, without the consent of the Senate. I call attention now to about twenty cases of that kind, and, as in the first case, the very first example that I notice is from the Father of his Country.

August 11, 1790, Col. David Humphreys was on the eve of the adjournment of Congress instructed to proceed to Lisbon and deliver a letter to Chevalier Pinto and confer with him on the subject of insuring "the reception and treatment with the requisite respect" of "the diplomatic grade which alone coincides with our system." He was to return to Lisbon after two or three months to receive further instructions and avoid in the meanwhile all suspicion of being on public business.

Here there was no investigation, yet the appointment was made on the day before the Senate adjourned. The nomination could have been submitted by the President to the Senate, but he would not do this, but of his own motion, the Senate being in session, he appointed a person to perform a high diplomatic duty. That was done by George Washington.

April 16, 1794, Nathaniel C. Higginson was appointed during a session of Congress special agent to proceed to the islands of Barbadoes, Tobago, Grenada, Martinico, Dominica, Antigua, Montserrat, St. Christopher, San Domingo, Jamaica, and New Providence, to obtain a "list of all vessels belonging to citizens of the United States which have been condemned there since Great Britain began to take part in the war against France."

He was also to examine into all hardships which the American captains or crews have been exposed to by the conduct of the courts or ships of war, public or private, and amongst other things whether they have been plundered, insulted, on the trials, or in any manner deprived of a fair trial, etc.

He had another specific duty besides making an inquiry. He was to examine cases in which American vessels had been condemned by prize courts, and where there was a proper case to enter appeals on behalf of the United States.

We come now to Mr. Madison. January 26, 1812, George Matthews and John McKee, during a session of Congress and by virtue of the secret act of January 15 (February 7), 1811, were appointed commissioners to take temporary possession, amicably if possible, forcibly if any suspicion should arise of armed interference by some other power, of certain parts of East and West Florida.

This appointment was made, in virtue of the secret act of Congress of January 15, 1811. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to that act, which I have now before me. I shall not read it, but it contains no specific power to appoint anybody; it only says the President shall take possession, and left it to him to determine how, when, and under what circumstances he would take possession. That was under Mr. Madison.

March 25, 1816, Christopher Hughes, jr., was appointed during a session of Congress special agent to Colombia to secure the release of certain American prisoners at Carthagena.

That was a diplomatic duty of the very highest character, to treat with a government to secure the release of prisoners. It had nothing to do with investigation.

December 20, 1816, Septimus Tyler was appointed during a session of Congress agent to San Domingo to guard the personal as well as the commercial rights of American citizens trading with the island, and on January 29, 1817, an agent for the purpose of claiming indemnity due petitioners for property unjustly taken from them.

There was no investigation in either one of these cases, but only specific diplomatic duties.

January 29, 1817, Septimus Tyler was appointed during a session of Congress special agent to Haiti, and instructed to visit Cape François and obtain redress for the confiscation of property of American citizens.

February 22, 1820, Charles S. Todd was during a session of Congress appointed a confidential agent to Venezuela and New Granada (the country being in a state of revolution and without recognized authorities as established governments). The objects of his mission were to obtain correct information concerning the state of that country and the interesting events there occurring, to promote and maintain relations of friendship, and to obtain indemnity for certain claims of citizens of the United States—a diplomatic duty of the very highest character.

January 30, 1821, Edward Wyer was appointed during a session of Congress "an agent to renew the demand of indemnity to certain citizens of the United States deprived of their property by an arbitrary process of the government of the late Gen. Christophe" at Santo Domingo. That was not an investigation, but a high diplomatic duty—to make a demand.

December 13, 1822, William McRee, of Virginia, was during a session of Congress appointed agent and commissary to demand delivery of the Florida archives at Havana, "and also to make such representation to the governor of Cuba as may be advisable for the suppression of the piracies which for some time past have so severely annoyed the commerce of the United States."

There was no investigation there.

We come down now to 1842, when Mr. Tyler was President. I am not sure but that Daniel Webster was then Secretary of State. I know he was Secretary of State under Mr. Tyler, though I am not sure about his being Secretary of State at that particular date.

February 15, 1842, Tully R. Wise was appointed during a session of Congress a special agent to proceed to Havana on a confidential errand relating to the settlement of claims between the United States and Spain.

There was no investigation there.

In 1850, when Mr. Fillmore was President—Mr. Webster was Secretary of State under Mr. Fillmore from July 22, 1850, till the time of his death. December 20, 1850, George G. Goss was appointed during a session of Congress special agent to Mexico for the purchase and improvement of certain land for an American cemetery near the City of Mexico.

There was no investigation there.

Again, under President Taylor, April 22, 1850, Robert Greenhow was appointed during a session of Congress agent to obtain documentary evidence respecting claims (Mexican) to be used before the Board of Commissioners under the treaty of February 2, 1848, showing their fraudulent character.

January 18, 1851, under Mr. Fillmore, Mr. Webster being Secretary of State, Robert M. Walsh was appointed during a session of Congress special agent to coöperate with the representatives of France and Great Britain for the purpose of bringing about a peace between Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

There was no investigation there, but a high diplomatic duty.

April 29, 1852, Mr. Webster being still Secretary of State, Robert M. Walsh was appointed during a session of Congress special envoy to Costa Rica, to obtain a settlement of disputes between Costa Rica and Nicaragua in regard to their boundaries, which are obstacles to the commencement of the canal across Nicaragua. I call attention of the Senators on the other side to the fact that in this case the appointee was called a "special envoy."

So, Mr. President, the contention that for the mere purposes of investigation these agents and commissioners may be appointed, and for nothing else, is shown to be unfounded. All the cases to which I have alluded contain, or at least the last batch of them contain, other specific and great powers, not of the character only of investigation.

I have up to this point cited some twenty cases arising under the most distinguished Presidents of the United States and distinguished Secretaries of State.

Now, I come to the act of John Quincy Adams when he was President of the United States, an act which was very much discussed in the Congress of the United States at the time, in reference to the celebrated Panama Congress which was to be held in 1826. President John Quincy Adams in his annual message of December 6, 1825, in speaking of the Panama congress and the invitation to the United States to send a minister there, said:

> The invitation has been accepted, and ministers on the part of the United States will be commissioned to attend at those deliberations, and to take part in them, so far as is compatible with that neutrality from which it is neither our intention nor the desire of the other American States that we should depart.

That was the announcement made to Congress in his annual message of December 6, 1825; yet after announcing his intention to act and his acceptance of the invitation without any consultation with the Senate, and of his purpose to send these ministers without any consultation with the Senate, he sent in a special message for a specific purpose, and I will let him explain the purpose in his own language:

> Although this measure—

Speaking of the Panama Congress and the invitation—> was deemed to be within the constitutional competency of the Executive, I have not thought proper to take any step in it before ascertaining that my opinion of its expediency will concur with that of both branches of the Legislature: first, by the decision of the Senate upon the nominations to be laid before them; and secondly, by the sanction of both Houses to the appropriations, without which it can not be carried into effect.

So, whilst avowing his belief and conviction in the competency of the Executive to do all this without consulting Congress, yet as a matter of expediency, he says, "I want to know the opinion of Congress before I do it, because, unless I can get an appropriation from Congress and the assent of the Senate and the House of Representatives, I can not send ministers." This mission was not to make a treaty, as is shown by the commission given to the ministers. It is argued that the President may make an appointment of a representative to make a treaty, just as he may to investigate without the assent of the Senate, but I shall show after awhile that there is nothing in that point to affect this question. I want to show now, and I can show, that the mission was not to make a treaty, as is shown by the commission given to the ministers. It alludes to no treaty and fails to state that what was done should be transmitted to the President for ratification by him and by the Senate, which is universally done, without a single exception, when power is given to make a treaty.

I have the commission here of the ministers to that congress, and I will state to the Senate, without reading it, that the deliberations of that congress were about peace and friendship, and commerce and navigation, and maritime laws, and neutral and belligerent rights, and all matters interesting to the American nations, or which may be given to them in charge, and there is no statement that anything they agreed to should be sent to the President for his ratification and be laid before the Senate, which conclusively shows that it was a mere congress to deliberate and exchange views, without intending to make any treaty at all. Up to this point we have many precedents, commencing with the very beginning of the Government and running down to the very latest date.

I shall notice another, which, whilst it shows that President Arthur may or may not have entertained a different opinion about it, yet Mr. Blaine certainly did entertain the opinion that he had the right to appoint Mr. Trescot for the purposes which I shall proceed hereafter to state without submitting his name to the Senate.

On the 28th of November, 1881, William H. Trescot was commissioned envoy to Peru, Chile, and Bolivia by a commission, stating that his office was to last "until his authority shall be revoked by the President." His duty was to bring about negotiations between these three countries—not to make a treaty himself, but to aid in settling the pending difficulties between these three countries.

It was only five or six days before Congress met when that commission was given. Mr. Blaine resigned his office on the 19th of December, and on the very day when he resigned and was no longer Secretary of State, Trescot's name was sent to the Senate and confirmed on the 20th. This shows that Mr. Blaine's view was that no confirmation was necessary, and Mr. Trescot's first commission, to which I have just alluded, was "until the authority shall be revoked by the President of the United States," and not as the Constitution requires, if it was intended to fill a vacancy in the office which was required to be confirmed by the Senate, not "until the expiration of the next term of the Senate." Whenever a commission is given in vacation which does not contain that provision, it is in violation of the Constitution of the United States if the appointee be a real officer of the United States and thus required to be confirmed.

Mr. GRAY. An officer in the sense of the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, an officer in the sense of the Constitution. On that subject I suppose I had as well here as at any other time call attention to another criticism made upon the President of the United States, that he appointed Mr. Blount as commissioner to Hawaii with paramount authority over Mr. Stevens. I shall show, as I can show without much trouble, that Mr. Trescot was appointed minister plenipotentiary to three countries—Chile, Peru, and Bolivia—at every one of which we had ministers, and when he was appointed the powers of those ministers as to certain things, as was done in the case of Mr. Blount, were made subordinate to him.

Here is a letter from Mr. Blaine to one of these ministers, in which he informs him that Mr. Trescot has been commissioned as special envoy with the rank of minister plenipotentiary to the republics of Chile, Peru, and Bolivia, and will forthwith set out upon his mission. Mr. Blaine said:

> The commission which Mr. Trescot receives will not supersede the ordinary duties of yourself and your colleagues at Lima and La Paz; but all communications and negotiations connected with the settlement of the pending difficulties between Chile, Peru, and Bolivia, so far as this Government may deem it judicious to take action, will be transferred to Mr. Trescot's charge.

That is a case in point on that subject.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the date of the instructions?

Mr. GEORGE. November 30, 1881. So if Mr. Cleveland is to be crucified for sending Blount to Hawaii with powers paramount to Mr. Stevens, then the memory of Mr. Blaine is to be discredited for sending Mr. Trescot with powers paramount to three of our ministers, one at Chile, one at Peru, and one at Bolivia.

Now, I proceed a little further in the investigation of the constitutional question, as to what is an officer in the constitutional sense of the term. The Constitution of the United States contains this provision:

> No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

That is a plain and specific provision, and yet, sir, in the case of the Brussels monetary conference the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] were appointed commissioners on behalf of the United States. In the Bering Sea tribunal, the great tribunal which settled the dispute between the United States and Great Britain in reference to the Bering Sea fisheries, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] was appointed. In everything but tenure these places were offices under the authority of the United States. They were created by law; the duties were prescribed by law. Some part of the sovereign functions of government to be exercised for the benefit of the public were vested in them. They had also emoluments. In the case of the Brussels conference they were to meet commissioners from other nations and confer, as I will read. The statute declared that—

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint five commissioners.

I hope those Senators on the other side of the Chamber who have made such complaint about Mr. Cleveland using the word "commissioner" will take note of that fact, inasmuch as they claim that the term "commissioner" is fixed by law to mean a diplomatic officer. The statute declares that—

The President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint five commissioners to an international conference * * * with a view to secure, internationally, a fixity of relative value between gold and silver, as money by means of a common ratio between those metals, with free mintage at such ratio.

And $80,000 was appropriated for the purpose of paying the expenses and the compensation of the commissioners.

Mr. President, I suppose that a more important mission was never committed to a citizen of the United States than was committed to these men, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] being one of them, and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES] another. They had charge of the biggest and most important question that has ever arisen during peace in our history—the endeavor to get an international agreement about the free coinage of silver. Yet those men were Senators, and the President violated the Constitution of the United States in appointing them while Senators, if they were officers in the constitutional sense. They were selected, I believe, during the session of the Senate and their names were never submitted to us for confirmation. But whether that be correct or not, if they were officers in the constitutional sense it was a gross violation of the Constitution on the part of the President to appoint them and as gross a violation on the part of the Senators to accept the appointment.

Then there is another case. The treaty between the United States and Great Britain provided for the appointment by the President of two persons to represent the United States at the conference which was to settle the dispute about the Bering Sea. Call them arbitrators, call them commissioners, call them judges, call them what you please, they were charged with the highest duty that could be performed by any subordinate officer in the United States. They had to settle the question of the jurisdiction of the United States and of Russia over a large part of the Pacific Ocean, and they were to do various things which involved the very highest powers, the very gravest duties. Yet when the President came to select the men to perform that duty, if they were officers, he violated the Constitution as I have read the clause to the Senate, by selecting a member of this body, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], and he violated it further by not submitting the name of the Senator from Alabama to the Senate for confirmation. In nothing did those men to whom I I have alluded differ from officers of the Government of the United States under the Constitution except in the tenure of their offices.

This tenure or term did not expire by efflux of time, but only, as in Mr. Blount's case, by the performance of the specific duty for which they were appointed. As was shown by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] the other day, where the appointment is made for the performance of a specific duty or specific duties, then the term of the officer or the term of employment, or the term of the employé ended with the performance of the duties, and by the settled rules of law, in that case they are not officers. I shall say more about that directly.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senator leaves the very interesting and important precedent of the appointment of the Bering Sea arbitrators I wish to bring a fact in connection with their duties and powers to the attention of the Senate and of those Senators who seem to settle and dismiss from consideration all these instances in which commissioners have been appointed by the President of the United States to negotiate treaties with the remark or criticism that that is merely to perform a perfunctory duty of bringing about terms between two negotiating countries which are to be afterwards submitted to the Senate of the United States for its ratification and approval, and that nothing final or determinate is fixed by the negotiations which such commissioners carry on.

I call attention to the fact that in the instance of the appointment of the arbitrators in the Bering Sea matter they were specially charged in a certain contingency by the seventh article of the treaty between Great Britain and the United States to make regulations that should govern the taking of seals in the Bering Sea and in the North Pacific that were to be binding and were to have force and effect from the finding and statement of the arbitrators themselves. The regulations were not to be reported to the President and approved by him, but the commissioners themselves were to fix the terms on which seal fishing might be carried on in that great scope of the North Pacific.

Mr. GEORGE. The remark made by the Senator from Delaware as to the finality of the action of the Bering Sea commissioners, whilst I do not think it adds anything to the force of the position that they are not officers, does answer very conclusively the contention made upon the other side upon that subject.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Mississippi to continue his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to show what a distinguished member of this body thought upon the subject of the Brussels conference. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 22, 1893. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], after quoting the clause of the Constitution that I have just read which prohibits the appointment of any Senator or Representative to a civil office under the United States, said:

A practice seems to be growing up of establishing certain public duties or functions, which are in all respects analogous to those performed by civil officers, and imposing them upon members of this or the other House. The President of the United States has within the last year sent abroad members of this body, whom we all esteem, men fitted for the grave and delicate responsibilities which were imposed upon them, to represent this country in dealing with foreign nations in one case, and in another country before a great tribunal which is to determine a great international dispute. It is a very serious question in my mind whether such function is not the function of a civil officer, and whether all the reasons which the framers of the Constitution had in the prohibition which I have read do not apply to such a case as that.

That was what the Senator from Massachusetts said in the opening of the debate. After it had proceeded awhile the Senator used the language I am about to read. He was at that point replying to a statement made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that he was not an officer because he had not taken an official oath. The Senator from Massachusetts replied to that in this way, and in that he declared more clearly his opinion upon this question.

Now, my honorable friend—

Referring to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]— says it was not an office, because he did not take an oath, because no oath was required, and because there was no emolument. It seems to me, whether a particular function be that of a public office depends not upon the safeguard of the oath, but upon the thing to be transacted, and if the receiving instructions from the President of the United States, bearing those instructions abroad, communicating them to the representatives of a foreign government, enforcing them in debate, hearing and weighing their views in return, reporting them to his own countrymen, and concurring in the action of a body whose action, if unanimous, is very likely to effect and bind the action of the governments represented, be not in its nature and essence a public office, then it seems to me that the function of no foreign ambassador or agent, special or general, envoy ordinary or envoy extraordinary, is a public office.

I read that, sir, not to show that they were officers, because I do not think they were, but to show that in the opinion of a distinguished member of this body the functions of those men were exactly the same as those of officers and that they essentially were officers. And if it depended alone upon the functions which they were to perform, he would have been correct. They are not officers solely because they did not have the constitutional tenure and for no other reason, as I will show before I get through.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps before the Senator gets through he will give us his views in regard to another suggestion connected with the same matter. If it is more convenient to him, as he has been interrupted, I will call his attention to it now instead of later, when he may be speaking on another point. I should like to ask the Senator whether he maintains that it is within the power of the President of the United States to impose the ordinary functions of executive officers described in the Constitution, the method of whose appointment is there limited, whether the term of office is limited or not, and have all those functions completely accomplished and performed by persons who are not executive officers.

Mr. GEORGE. Is that the question?

Mr. HOAR. That is the question. I do not ask the Senator to answer it in his first sentence, but if he deals with the general subject I should like to have his views upon the question I have submitted.

Mr. GEORGE. I will answer it. It has been conceded all along in this debate that the President may appoint persons called envoys, ministers, ambassadors, commissioners, chargés d'affaires, or whatever you may be pleased to call them, for the specific purpose of making a treaty. It has been conceded that he may make the appointment during the session of the Senate and without submitting to the Senate the name of the person so appointed. That seems to be conceded.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Mississippi will pardon me, I will state that I do not think it is conceded.

Mr. GRAY. It is conceded overwhelmingly.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator from Massachusetts deny that?

Mr. HOAR. Yes; I deny it. Let the Senator be more careful and observe what he has just said.

Mr. HIGGINS. We on this side can not hear what the Senator from Massachusetts says.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Mississippi says it has been conceded that the President may appoint ambassadors, charges d'affaires, ministers, or whatever else, using the constitutional phrase, persons to be appointed by the advice and consent of the Senate, without the advice and consent of the Senate while the Senate is in session. I have heard no such concession.

It has been conceded that one of the things usually done by these officers, to wit, to ascertain and report the opinion of a foreign government or to convey to a foreign government the opinion of this, may be done by a messenger who is not a charges d'affaires, or minister plenipotentiary, or ambassador. That has been done. But I have heard nobody concede, certainly not myself, certainly not my honorable friend from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS], that these constitutional officers may be appointed during the session of the Senate without its consent. That is the distinction—it is one distinction, at any rate—between the case of Mr. Blount and all the other cases which are cited as precedents on the other side. The President did not simply direct Mr. Blount to ascertain whether our troops ought to be withdrawn, and then direct the naval officer to withdraw them if Mr. Blount was of that opinion. He did not simply direct Mr. Blount to tell him what was the state of affairs in Hawaii. He added to that, "Do this, and also, until otherwise ordered, exercise supremely all the functions of a constitutional officer without the consent of the Senate." I should like to ask my friend from Minnesota if I am right in the statement. I shall not interrupt the Senator from Mississippi further.

Mr. GEORGE. I stated it no further than this——

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. Supplementary to what the Senator from Massachusetts has said, giving the substance and effect of Mr. Blount's authority, I will state that the language of his letter of credence was that in all matters affecting the relations between the two governments his authority should be paramount.

Mr. HOAR. That is the language.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I stated that it has been conceded all along that the President might appoint persons, whether they were called ambassadors or what not, who were charged with the specific duty only of drawing up and signing a treaty on behalf of the United States.

If that has not been conceded, then I have mistaken the concessions made, and I will be compelled to do what I did not intend to do—to cite some precedents upon the subject.

On May 3, 1838, Nathaniel Niles was appointed during a session of Congress special agent, and empowered to negotiate a commercial convention respecting the admission of American tobacco into the ports of Sardinia and in regard to the trade generally between the two countries. That is one case.

On July 23, 1886, George H. Bates was appointed during a session of Congress special commissioner to visit Tonga, to the end of concluding and signing a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation.

May 19, 1888, John G. Walker was appointed during session of Congress secretary of legation and consul-general at Bogota, and empowered to treat concerning a settlement of the claim of Julio R. Santos, growing out of his arrest and imprisonment and for his injuries and losses sustained at the hands of the authorities of Ecuador.

December 28, 1844, Delazon Smith was appointed during a session of Congress special agent, and empowered to negotiate concerning claims of citizens of the United States upon the Government of the late Republic of Colombia and upon the Government of Ecuador.

June 15, 1850, A. Dudley Mann was appointed during a session of Congress special agent, and empowered to negotiate concerning friendship, commerce, navigation, etc., with Switzerland.

January 27, 1832, Edmund Roberts was appointed during a session of Congress special agent "for the purpose of examining in the Indian Ocean the means of extending the commerce of the United States by commercial arrangement with the powers whose dominions border on those seas." He was directed to first proceed to Cochin China, to inform himself as to the trade carried on between that kingdom and other countries, the nature of products, etc. Upon reaching the capital he was to present himself to the King with his credentials and gain permission for the admission of United States ships to his harbors for purposes of trade, etc. He was also empowered to conclude a commercial treaty with the King. The same instructions were to guide him in his missions to Siam and the powers of Arabia on the Red Sea. Empowered as commissioner January 20, 1832, to negotiate with Cochin China, Japan, Muscat, and Siam concerning commerce and navigation, to which countries he had letters of credence.

He was sent by Gen. Jackson. There are numerous other precedents of that sort. I have always understood during this debate, I may have misunderstood the Senators, that they claimed that the right to make these selections for the purpose of negotiating and making treaties came from the fact that the President was authorized by the Constitution to make a treaty, and therefore was entitled to make those appointments. Is that the understanding of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]? Does he understand that to be the argument?

Mr. GRAY. That is as I understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. TURPIE. I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether he desires to state also that all the appointments he has cited were made during the sessions of Congress without the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. GEORGE. I do wish to so state as to every single one of them, except, possibly, Mr. Walker, appointed in May, 1888. As to him I am not certain. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] calls my attention to the appointment of Gen. Babcock during the session of the Senate, without the advice and consent of the Senate, who was sent to San Domingo. At any rate, there are numerous instances coming down from the earliest period in which the President of the United States has commissioned, appointed, and selected men to negotiate treaties. There is the very late case during the former Administration of Mr. Cleveland. He selected Mr. Putnam and Mr. Angell to assist in making the fisheries treaty with Great Britain without submitting their names to the Senate.

The diplomatic history of the country is full of appointments of that sort, and these appointments, as the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] understood and as I understood and as I have no doubt the record will show, have been justified upon the ground that the President is authorized and empowered by the Constitution to make treaties, and that he may select a person to make a treaty, call him what he will, and that the appointment is valid because the treaty has to come back to the President and be ratified by him and by the Senate before it takes effect. If that is not the position of the Senators I do not understand it. I claim that upon another ground, which I will state to the Senate, that all those appointments of persons to negotiate treaties are but an exemplification and an illustration of the rule which I shall show to exist in the Constitution of the United States, that these persons are not officers because they do not possess the tenure prescribed by that instrument as necessary to constitute an officer. All these appointments, including those to make treaties and to investigate, and the others I have alluded to, are justifiable on the ground that the appointees have not the constitutional tenure, and on no other ground.

The precedents relating to treaties are admitted; but it is claimed they are justified because the treaty is not valid till ratified by the President and the Senate, and the Constitution gives the President the power to make the treaties. But this is not the true reason; for, first, the negotiations which result in a treaty are the most essential part of the treaty making. On that point I desire to read to the Senate what was said by the distinguished members of the Committee on Foreign Relations when they were attacking Mr. Cleveland in 1888, about the fisheries treaty. They complained, and it seems Mr. Cleveland can not do anything in our foreign affairs that will satisfy the gentlemen on the other side. The report of the majority of the committee, presented by Judge Edmunds, on page 17, says:

> These plenipotentiaries—
> Referring to Mr. Angell and Mr. Putnam—> came to a conclusion of their labors on the 15th of February, 1889, and the offices of "plenipotentiaries" terminated, and the result was reached without the advice and consent of the Senate having been asked or taken concerning the selection of these public ministers, and without any communication to either House of Congress concerning this most important subject.
> * * * * * * *
> It is no answer to this suggestion to say—
>
> The very argument they make here now—
> that an arrangement thus concluded can not be valid or effectual without the advice and consent of the Senate, for the rights and interests of the people of the United States might be so neglected, misunderstood, abandoned, or sold by President's "plenipotentiaries" as to greatly embarrass, if not defeat, their ultimate reassertion in better times and under better administrations, though it is hoped that such will not be the case in respect of these negotiations.

So it is clear that the position assumed, that persons selected to negotiate these treaties may be selected without the advice and consent of the Senate during the session of the Senate, can not be justified upon the ground that the President has the right to make the treaty, but must be justified on some other ground.

This argument is further answered by this: if the power to make a treaty may be transferred to another on the ground that the treaty can not become operative until it receives the sanction of the Senate and of the President, then for the same reason the President may delegate the power to nominate a person to the Senate for appointment to office. The Constitution in one case says he shall make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and in the other, he shall nominate, etc., and, by like advice and consent, appoint.

So I claim that all these appointments to make treaties come within the rule stated by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] in his speech, and which I shall undertake to show is the rule clearly fixed by the Constitution of the United States.

We have seen sir, how these appointees are made to perform the most important functions of government. These agencies, call them what you please, to make treaties, to demand indemnity, to settle disputes between foreign countries, and all that sort of thing, have been made from the very beginning during the session of the Senate, without consulting that body. Now, let us see if we can find the principle upon which this is done.

The true rule is, that in the sense of that clause of the Constitution which requires appointments to office to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an appointment or employment to do a particular thing, or specific things, is without a constitutional tenure, and is not an office. This idea is plain in the Constitution.

First, it will help to understand the Constitution to refer to some decisions on the subject. In The United States vs. Hartwell, 6 Wallace Reports, page 393, it is said:

> The term [office] embraces the idea of tenure, duration, emolument, and duties. * * *
>
> A Government office is different from a Government contract. The latter, from its nature, is necessarily limited in its duration and specific in its objects.

Chief Justice Marshall said, in The United States vs. Maurice, 2 Brockenbrough's Reports, on page 103:

> If a duty be a continuing one, which is defined by rules prescribed by Government, and not by contract, which an individual is appointed by Government to perform, who enters on the duties pertaining to his station without any contract defining them, if these duties continue, though the person be changed, it would seem to be an office.

I shall not go into that any further, because that matter was very thoroughly discussed by the Senator from Delaware some days ago.

From these and other authorities cited by the Senator from Delaware it is settled that one great test is that the "duties continue, though the person be changed." Another test is, that the duties are prescribed by law and not by agreement between the parties.

Mr. Blount's case comes up to neither of these. The employment was not created by law, but by the parties Blount and the President, and the duties would not continue after Blount's removal or death. They were personal and special to him. There was not a constitutional tenure.

The employment necessarily ceased with the performance of the specific duty assumed or imposed. Mr. Blount had no predecessor, and could have no successor, consequently he could not have held an office, for if the like duties were conferred on another, it would be a new employment.

This rule covers not only the appointments to make treaties but also the appointments to investigate and the other appointments I have alluded to, viz, appointments to insure reception of diplomatic officials of a particular grade, to enter appeals, to take possession of Florida, to bring about reëstablishment of diplomatic relations with Spain, to secure release of prisoners, to claim indemnity, to obtain redress for confiscated property, to promote relations of friendship and obtain indemnity, to demand indemnity, to demand delivery of archives, to remonstrate against forcible seizure of property, relating to settlement of claims, to purchase and improve land for a cemetery, to obtain documentary evidence, to cooperate in bringing about peace between two foreign countries, and to bring about settlement of disputes about the boundary between two foreign countries.

Appointments to perform all of these duties have been made without question by the ablest Presidents of the United States up to the present time without the consent and advice of the Senate, and were made during the session of the Senate.

In all these the employment, or office, if you so call it, is not of the kind named in the Constitution as an office.

The Supreme Court said in the case of United States vs. Hartwell, 6 Wallace Reports, that the term "office" embraced the idea of "tenure," among others. That is, an office without a fixed legal tenure is not possible. When we think of "office" we necessarily include the idea of tenure or of duration of duties or the estate of the incumbent in the office. When we refer to the clauses of the Constitution under review we find that "tenure," and that of a particular kind, is a most important, a most essential idea embraced in office as therein referred to.

In every instance in the Constitution in which an office is established the tenure or term or the estate of the officer in the office is invariably fixed, either by express words or by an implication clear and indisputable. The terms of office of Representatives and Senators and of President and Vice-President and judges are expressly fixed. The terms of all others are fixed by implication, whose force has been recognized from the beginning. In the First Congress, after a great debate, it was settled that the terms of all offices, other than those whose terms had been expressly fixed by the Constitution, were, during life, subject to removal by the President or by impeachment. Afterwards it was settled that power is vested by the Constitution in Congress to reduce the life tenure to a specified number of years but still subject to be terminated by removal by the President.

Hence it is manifest that there is no office recognized as such in the Constitution whose tenure of office or term does not expire by efflux of time, either fixed or indefinite, with the superadded condition that such term could be terminated by a power ab extra, operating to remove the incumbent.

As this power of removal can have no effect in determining the question before us one way or the other, all further consideration of it may be dismissed in ascertaining the tenure fixed by the Constitution, or authorized to be fixed by Congress.

Article II, section 2, clause 2, of the Constitution reads as follows:

> He [i. e., the President] shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law.
>
> The third clause, which immediately follows, is:
>
> The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate—
> In the above-described offices—
> by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

These two clauses contain all the provisions of the Constitution in relation to the power of the President to appoint officers. They are in immediate juxtaposition, and each the complement of the other. The one refers to appointments during the session of the Senate, and the other to filling vacancies in the same offices which may happen during the recess of the Senate. As the first refers to all offices, of course the latter can refer to no more than all, and it manifestly refers to no less

It is manifest, therefore, that the two must be construed together, and that both refer to the same agencies or offices—that is, to "all offices." Both are necessary parts of the same scheme; hence, vacancies in the "all offices," whose incumbents are to be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate, may be filled in vacation by recess appointments, and likewise no employé or public agent, or, if you please to so call him, no officer, is embraced in the first clause as required to be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate whose successor, in case of a vacancy, could not be appointed under the last clause or during the recess of the Senate.

This being established beyond successful controversy, we must now ascertain what offices may be filled during the recess of the Senate. The language of this clause is without ambiguity. It confers the power to appoint and then fixes the means and the form by which the appointment is to be made and the tenure, to wit, "by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session;" that is, at the end of the next session of the Senate.

The vacancy can be filled in no other mode than by granting a commission "which shall expire" at the time stated. It shall expire then, and at no other time. The appointee is an officer till that expiration, and not one moment longer and not one moment shorter.

As the vacancy can be filled in no other mode than by granting a commission which shall expire at the end of the next session of the Senate, it follows that no office can be thus filled the tenure or term of which is inconsistent or incompatible with the tenure fixed for the recess appointee; that is, would not in regular course expire by efflux of time, which time would extend beyond the term fixed for granting the commission; that is, beyond the end of the next session of the Senate.

The argument which sustains this view is unanswerable, both when considered with reference to the words of the Constitution, and also when tested by the policy which the Constitution manifestly established.

By the Constitution the Senate is not strictly, as it is sometimes stated, a part of the appointing power; but that is immaterial. The Senate, at all events, have no power of naming or selecting the person to be appointed. They can only assent to or refuse their assent to an appointment to be made solely by the President, of a person selected by him alone and named by him alone, for their advice and consent. The advice and consent of the Senate amounts to nothing more than making the person eligible for appointment to the particular office for the full constitutional term.

The Senate will remember that in a very early case, in Marbury vs. Madison, Chief Justice Marshall held that after the confirmation took place, then the act of appointment was to be made. It is a loose and incorrect idea sometimes entertained that the ratification or the confirmation of a nomination, or the giving of the advice and consent of the Senate to a nomination, is in fact the appointment. It is only the authority to make the appointment and only shows the eligibility of the nominee to appointment for the full constitutional term. If their advice and consent be refused, still the nominee may be appointed in vacation to hold till the end of the next session of the Senate.

Officers, when appointed, whether by the advice and consent of the Senate, or by the President alone, are in all respects full constitutional officers with the same powers and rights and duties. The advice and consent of the Senate add nothing to the constitutional powers and duties of an officer, nor does the want of such advice and consent detract from them. The powers of the recess appointee are in every respect as full, as perfect, as that of the session appointee, made with the advice and consent of the Senate. The advice and consent of the Senate, though we Senators are apt to think otherwise, do not, like the laying on of hands in the ordination of a priest or minister, impart any peculiar grace, power, or excellence to the officer.

The only constitutional difference between officers appointed in the one mode or in the other is simply the tenure or term for which he holds the place. When appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate the officer holds, if a judge, during good behavior, or if an executive officer, for life or for the statutory term of four years, in cases where that term has been fixed by Congress, subject, of course, to removal by the President, or by impeachment. When appointed by the President alone, in the recess of the Senate, he holds until the expiration of their next session. And he holds until then, though his name may have been in the mean time submitted to the Senate and rejected; and after such rejection his powers are just as full as before: and, after the expiration of the next session, he may be appointed again with a tenure to expire at the end of the next succeeding session.

Then, as it is manifest that the only distinction between an officer appointed one way and an officer appointed in the other is one of tenure, and that the Constitution in requiring the assent of the Senate does no more than give to the officer a different tenure than that given to one appointed by the President alone, can there be a doubt that the tenure of the recess appointment is less than the tenure of the other? This tenure must be the same in both cases, or greater or less in the recess appointee than in the other? It is manifestly not the same, for the commission of no other officer expires at the end of the next session of the Senate. It can not be greater, for in many cases that would be impossible, both in cases of life appointments and in appointments for a term of years, and besides it is absurd to suppose that the Constitution meant to give a greater tenure to provisional appointees who, as the result of an unforeseen accident, were allowed to be appointed by the President alone than to those appointed with the regular constitutional assent of the Senate.

The tenure or time or estate of the officer must therefore be less than that of a regular session appointment.

It has thus been established beyond controversy that the Constitution in the clauses under consideration refers alone to appointments of officers whose terms or tenure of office are determined by efflux of time, which time would be abridged by a commission expiring at the next session of the Senate. It must therefore result that it does not refer to an employment like that of Mr. Blount, which, being for the performance of a specific duty, necessarily terminated with the performance of that duty and not by efflux of time. There was nothing in Mr. Blount's employment, if public, but the duty to make the inquiry intrusted to him by the President, including the performance of such acts as were subsidiary to and assisting in the inquiry, and nothing remained of his employment after that inquiry was finished. It was not an employment, therefore, which, if it began in the recess of the Senate, could be made to terminate by efflux of time, or the expiration of the next session of the Senate, or in any other way than by performance. An attempt to do so would be an attempt to confer on Mr. Blount something essentially different from the employment he held.

In strict analogy to this is the tenure of office of electors of President and Vice-President. These persons are in all respects officers of the United States when tested by the usual definition of officers, except in tenure.

The office of elector is created by the Constitution of the United States. His duties are prescribed by the Constitution. His tenure is fixed by the Constitution. His duties are Federal, to elect a President and Vice-President. His qualifications are fixed by the Constitution of the United States. He would therefore be a Federal officer but for the fact that his tenure is not of the kind fixed by the Constitution for all Federal officers.

It is determined, ended, by the performance of the duty prescribed, or by a refusal or neglect to perform them on the day fixed by law, passed in pursuance of the Constitution. He has been treated not as a Federal officer from the beginning. He takes no oath of office, as every officer of the United States is bound to take. His compensation is paid by the State.

That he is appointed by the State is not a determining test, for he is appointed by the State in the performance of not only a Federal duty, but of a Federal function or power. So the President and Vice-President are appointed by the States. They are Federal officers undoubtedly.

But, Mr. President, as strong as the argument is, as strong as the precedents are that Mr. Blount's employment does not constitute him an officer, parties who arraign the President for his appointment are driven as a last resort to this: That the President called him a special commissioner, and that by a statute of the United States a diplomatic officer is defined to include a commissioner. The argument seems to be that, as the statute says a diplomatic officer includes a commissioner, as Mr. Blount was appointed a commissioner by the President, therefore he must be a diplomatic officer, and therefore his appointment was in violation of the Constitution of the United States in not having been submitted to the Senate.

The answer to this is twofold. The meaning of the term "commissioner" is defined only as it is used in that particular statute.

It is a definition only for the interpretation of that statute. Its whole force is to show what Congress means in that statute when they use that word. There is no attempt to define the word when used by the President, or by any other person, or in any other statute.

Mr. President, we have many commissioners recognized by the law of the United States. There is a Commissioner of Pensions, a Commissioner of Internal Revenue, a Commissioner of Education, a commissioner to take evidence, and various other kinds of commissioners, and yet it is not insisted in any other case than this that when the word "commissioner" is used it is meant a diplomatic officer.

The powers of Congress may be great and multiform, but it is not among them to go into the business of the lexicographer and fix the meaning of words for mankind or even for the American people. Congress, in order to make clear their own meaning, may arbitrarily, without reference to the true signification of a word, say that when they use a particular word they use it in a particular sense, but they can not give to any word a signification which everybody or anybody is bound to adopt when using it. Every human being has the same power of defining the meaning of any word he uses as that possessed by Congress. The power of Congress as to the signification of words is not an independent delegated power over the English language.

Whatever this power is, it comes from the necessity of using words in making a statute, and the manifest propriety of using such language as will express clearly the meaning of Congress. So Congress, instead of using a circumlocution to express an idea, may, when that idea is to be expressed, use any word, and say by that word in that statute that Congress means so and so, or conveys the idea expressed in the definition.

Congress in legislating under the Constitution may use a word which is also used in the Constitution, and say when they use that word they mean this or they mean that, but Congress has no power to enact that a particular word used in the Constitution shall have a particular meaning in the Constitution itself.

For instance, Congress may say that in a particular statute they use the words "public ministers" in a particular sense, and, if they say so, that meaning, in construing that statute, that is, in ascertaining what Congress meant in enacting that statute, must be followed, however foreign such meaning may be to the true and usual meaning of the word, or to its constitutional meaning.

But Congress has no power to affix a meaning to "public ministers," as used in the Constitution, different from that which appears in the Constitution itself.

But more than this, Mr. President, Blount was not appointed a "commissioner," but only a "special commissioner." A "special commissioner," like a special agent, has limited power to do a particular thing, and not general representative powers.

The statute uses also the word "agent," and defines it as meaning the same as "commissioner." Is it true that the President can not appoint a special agent to do anything without the consent of the Senate?

Mr. President, there is another argument which is complete and distinct, and independent from the one I have just made, and this last shows distinctly and unanswerably that Mr. Blount's employment was not an appointment to an office.

All officers of the United States must be appointed in one of these ways, either—

First. By the President, with the consent of the Senate; or Second. By the President alone in vacation; or Third. By act of Congress, authorizing it as to inferior officers.

Appointments may be made by the President alone, or—

Fourth. By a head of one of the Departments or a court of law.

There is no other method known to the Constitution by which a public minister or consul or other officer of the United States can be made. And whenever a public agent is made in any other way he is not an officer of the United States unless he is one of the special officers named in the Constitution, as the President or Vice President. That is, if a person having rightfully a public employment is to be considered as an officer of the Government of the United States, in a constitutional sense, he must be appointed in one of these ways, and if he has such public employment rightfully without such appointment he is not an officer of the Government of the United States. There can be no dispute of this proposition.

Now, sir, I wish to call attention to some practices of the Government, both of the legislative and of the executive department, upon the subject of appointing persons to public employment, which appear to be offices, but which are not offices, because the persons are not appointed in pursuance of the Constitution. There is a statute, section 1695 of the Revised Code, which authorizes the President to make rules as to the appointment of certain diplomatic and consular officers. Paragraph 87 of the regulations made in pursuance of this statute by the President of the United States for the government of our diplomatic and consular officers provides that in case of a vacancy of consul and vice-consul both, which requires the appointment of a person to temporarily perform the duties of the consulate, the diplomatic representative of the United States in that country has authority, with the consent of the foreign government, to make a temporary appointment; and paragraph 88 requires that the appointees to such vacancies shall be designated by the title of vice-consul, vice-commercial agent and not acting consul and acting commercial agent.

And yet when these appointments are made by the diplomatic representative, with the consent of the foreign government to fill the temporary vacancy, they possess all the powers and can perform all the duties, and they assume all the responsibilities of a regular vice consul, or vice-commercial agent, appointed in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States, and the only difference (and it is that difference which makes them no officers) is that they do not have the tenure prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. They have the powers, duties, and responsibilities of officers: they are in every sense officers except alone that they are appointed for a temporary period, for a period not recognized in the Constitution of the United States for officers; and that is the reason why they are not officers.

Now, Mr. President, I come to a very interesting part of the history of this Government upon that subject and it illustrates very fully the argument which I have attempted to impress upon the Senate.

It is a fact that up to the 1st of May, 1810, secretaries of legation were appointed by the ministers themselves. They are diplomatic officers, and yet they were allowed to be appointed by the ministers. When secretaries of legation were thus appointed by the ministers, when ministers were temporarily absent they turned over the diplomatic functions of the embassy to these secretaries of legation as chargés d'affaires; or, in other words, the ministers themselves appointed chargé d'affaires upon their own responsibility. Congress did not like that, and so on the 1st of May, 1810, Congress passed a law to this effect:

That to entitle any chargé des affaires, or secretary of any legation or embassy to any foreign country, or secretary of any minister plenipotentiary, to the compensation hereinbefore provided they shall respectively be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but in the recess of the Senate the President is hereby authorized to make such appointments, which shall be submitted to the Senate at the next session thereafter, for their advice and consent; and no compensation shall be allowed to any chargé des affaires, or any of the secretaries hereinbefore described, who shall not be appointed as aforesaid: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to authorize any appointment, etc.

That is a plain prohibition of the appointment of chargés d'affaires in any other way than by the President of the United States.

Now, what is the practice? I have before me a report made by Mr. Clay, when he was Secretary of State, dated January 31, 1827. Notwithstanding that statute, chargés d'affaires were appointed by the ministers or by the President without submitting their names to the Senate. In 1827, when the House of Representatives contained some of the most distinguished men whoever sat in it—I believe Mr. Webster was a member, and Mr. John Forsyth, of Georgia, was a member—they passed a resolution calling upon Mr. Clay, who was then Secretary of State, to answer certain inquiries, and one of the inquiries was the following:

Whether any, and, if any, what number of chargés des affaires have been appointed since the fourth day of March, 1789, without the advice and consent of the Senate; and whether, in any case, such appointment has been made after notice had been given of the intention of the minister abroad to return, and after his successor had been appointed.

That was the first inquiry. The statute which I have read was passed on the 1st of May, 1810, which prohibited the appointment of a chargé d'affaires except by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and if in vacation he was required to submit their names to the Senate when it met; and compensation was denied to any man appointed in a different mode.

Now, what is the answer of Mr. Clay on this subject? I find there were eighteen appointments of chargés d'affaires made between 1810 and the date of this report by the ministers themselves, every one of whom, according to the report made by Mr. Clay—for here is the account—every one was, if they were officers, paid in violation of the express terms of the statute.

Now, let us see if there is a principle which can justify the appointment of the chargés during all this long period of time apparently in express violation of the statute as well, as it seems, against the Constitution of the United States. It is found in the fact that the principle undertaken, and successfully undertaken, to be sustained by the Senator from Delaware the other day that temporary appointments, appointments to perform a particular duty, are not considered as officers in a legal sense. It justifies the argument, which I have made, that, under the Constitution of the United States, all the United States officers have a fixed tenure under the Constitution, and that when a man has not that tenure, he does not possess an office under the Constitution of the United States.

Now, let us see. These men held temporary appointments. Not one of them held until the expiration of a certain length of time. They did not hold for life unless removed first by the President, but the appointments were temporary, and terminated upon the return of the absent minister in case they were appointed during his absence, or their tenure terminated upon the appointment of a minister in case they were appointed when there was no minister.

Now, I want to show to the Senate how strong that principle is in the Constitution of the United States. Mr. Clay, in answer to the further inquiry, states that—

In some instances the temporary appointment has been continued after the intervention of a session of the Senate, as in the cases of Mr. Purviance, Mr. Russell, Mr. Lawrence, Mr. Jackson, Mr. Brent, Mr. Hughes, and Mr. Sheldon, and in two cases (those of Mr. Erving and Mr. Harris) after the intervention of several sessions of the Senate.

And they were all paid the statutory salary of a chargé d'affaires. I will read that to the Senate to show how strong that principle is in the Constitution. Mr. Erving received a salary as chargé d'affaires at Madrid, from the 24th of October, 1805, to April, 1810, four years five months and thirteen days, at $4,500 per year. That was before the act of 1810. Now, let us see as to another one, Mr. Harris. Mr. Levitt Harris received a salary from the 17th day of April, 1814, to the 21st day of February, 1817, nearly three years, under an appointment made by the minister. There is no justification for that action, except on the principle which I have stated to the Senate, that no man should be considered as an officer of the United States unless he has the tenure fixed by the Constitution. These persons did not have that tenure, and therefore whilst they discharged the duties of an officer, whilst they bore the recognized name of an officer, still on account of the tenure, and on account of the tenure alone, they were not officers, and were allowed to be appointed not in accordance with the Constitution and the statutes, which are thus conclusively shown not to apply.

The office of chargé d'affaires is a recognized diplomatic office. They are to be appointed as other public ministers, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, when appointed to a full constitutional term, yet so firmly implanted is the principle I have endeavored to sustain, that there can be no officer of the United States who has not the tenure recognized in the Constitution, these chargés when appointed for temporary purposes are allowed to be appointed by the President alone, or even by one of our foreign ministers.

Mr. President, there is one other question which has been very much discussed here and which deserves notice. The President has been arraigned for investing Mr. Blount with certain powers which are supposed to be unconstitutional powers. It is said that Mr. Blount was authorized to give an order to a naval officer, and that naval officer was bound to obey, and in that respect the President violated the Constitution of the United States. That action is justified by precedents, and I have some of them here, which I desire to read to the Senate. They show conclusively that the President in investing Mr. Blount with these powers followed the examples set by the greatest names in American history.

I shall now go back to the year 1823. I believe at that time James Monroe was President of the United States and John Quincy Adams was Secretary of State. I find a letter from the Secretary of the Navy directed to John Gallagher, commanding the United States brig Enterprise, in which it was stated:

> I request that you will, under the advice and approbation of Mr. Randall, special agent of the United States, carry into effect the views expressed by Mr. Adams, adhering strictly in all respects to the suggestions contained in his letters.

Here is an officer of the United States required to conform his action to the advice and approbation of Mr. Randall, who was a special agent, a civil officer of the United States. It is said that is not an order; but an obligation to follow the advice and act according to the approbation of a particular man is about as strong an order as can be given. It does not make any difference what kind of language is used, if a man is obliged to obey it is an order.

Here is a letter to the same man from the same Secretary and dated April 8, 1823:

> You will, however, regulate your operations by the advice of Mr. Randall, so as to be ready to receive him on board at any time.

If a naval officer is obliged to regulate his conduct by the advice of a man, is that not equivalent to investing that man with power to order him? Call it what you please, it is a stick held over him, the expression of a wish, the expression of an intent on the part of the civil officer which the naval officer is obliged to obey.

That was in Monroe's time.

I will now come to Mr. Arthur's time. Here is a letter by which an admiral in the Navy is informed that:

> The Department desires to impress upon you that the President attaches great importance to this mission—

That is Mr. Trescot's mission—> and it is hoped and expected that you will cheerfully render it such service as it may require. To accomplish this Mr. Trescot will consult with you, and you will be governed, as far as practicable, by his wishes.

What is that but telling the officer to obey Mr. Trescot's orders as far as practicable?

Here is another, going back a little further, dated November 6, 1869, a letter from George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy, to Capt. Balch:

> Gen. Babcock will have certain orders from the President of the United States. You are directed to conform to all his wishes and orders and to convey him to such points as he may desire to visit.

There the word "order" occurs. If the officer is bound to obey, if he is bound to conform to all the wishes of Gen. Babcock, then it is an order, and, besides, orders are expressly named.

That is not very ancient history—1869 and 1823. Here is another letter of the Secretary of State, Mr. Fish, addressing Gen. Babcock, in which he is informed that "on the proper execution of this instrument, the Navy Department will receive orders from the President to place at your disposal in the harbor of San Domingo a force sufficient to enable the United States to comply with their agreement in the proposed treaty."

There the naval officer is directed to obey the orders of Gen. Babcock. But I go back to the case of an illustrious President, a man who is supposed to have been more instrumental in framing the Constitution than any other—Mr. Madison. In 1812, I believe it was, or at least during Mr. Madison's Administration, he was authorized by an act of Congress to take possession of Florida. He sent a brigadier-general of the Army of the United States by the name of Matthews with some troops there to take possession of that country. Gen. Matthews disobeyed the orders of the President, and disobeyed them in a sense and in a manner which brought on diplomatic trouble. He seized possession of a part of Florida, which he was not authorized to do.

What did Mr. Madison do in that case? I want to call the attention of the Senate and of the country especially to this. He employed Governor Mitchell, of Georgia, who, so far as the United States were concerned, was a private citizen, that is, he had no official relations with the United States. He was the governor of a State. Mr. Madison, being dissatisfied with Gen. Matthews, requested Governor Mitchell to go and discharge the duties which he had imposed upon Gen. Matthews. In writing to Governor Mitchell, Mr. Monroe says:

> I inclose you an order from the Secretary of War to the commander of the troops of the United States to evacuate the country when requested so to do by you, and to pay the same respect in future to your order in fulfilling the duties enjoined by the law that he has been expected to do to that of Gen. Matthews.

So here is a case where the President of the United States superseded a military officer and authorized a private citizen, at least one who had no official relations with the United States, to perform the duties of that officer, and to give orders to the other military officers there which they were bound to obey.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HIGGINS. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if he contends that the President of the United States has the power to appoint a set of officers entirely irrespective of that military establishment created by an act of Congress and the officers of which have been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate—whether such a set of officers can be set aside by officers appointed by the President alone?

Mr. GEORGE. Of course I do not mean to assert any such proposition.

Mr. HIGGINS. Then I would ask——

Mr. GEORGE. Wait a moment. I do not mean to assert any such proposition. I am showing by the history of this country what the most illustrious Presidents, including President Monroe and Mr. Adams, when he was Secretary of State, and President Grant, did in relation to these matters, and did without criticism; and I have shown that what President Cleveland did was covered by the examples which I have quoted from these men. President Cleveland is not to be condemned for giving power to Mr. Blount to enable him to discharge his duty to investigate—and he never did a thing beyond that. When the President authorized Blount to give an order or to act in cooperation with a naval officer and directed a naval officer to obey his orders he was simply doing exactly what James Madison did, what James Monroe did, and what Ulysses S. Grant did, and what John Quincy Adams did. That is all.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to ask him whether he cites those precedents as examples of obedience of law or as violations of law by Presidents of the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not think that so small a man as I am is called upon at this late day to sit in judgment upon the acts of such illustrious men as those I have named. I make use of these precedents for the purpose of showing that the present President of the United States has done nothing more than his predecessors have done—and the Senator from Delaware will have ample opportunity to show if he can that I am wrong in the statements which I have made if he desires to do so—in fact the President has done nothing more than has been done by the most illustrious Presidents who have preceded him in his great office.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will allow me, I only wish to know just what ground he takes in respect to the President's powers—for the Senator is a very acute lawyer, and his opinion goes a long way with the Senate and the country—I wanted to know whether, in citing these precedents, he was doing it to sustain the contention that President Cleveland, in conferring this power upon Mr. Blount, was doing it in obedience of lawful power or in violation of lawful power?

Mr. GEORGE. I argued for some time to show that the powers which the President vested in Mr. Blount were properly vested for the purpose of enabling him to carry out a plain duty which the President had a right to impose upon him. I do not believe that the President has the right to set a civil officer over a naval officer or over a military officer, to take the command of the Army or the Navy away from the regularly appointed officers of the Army and Navy and confer it upon a citizen: but I do mean to say that in transacting and performing high duties which the Constitution has imposed upon him with reference to foreign powers, he may invest his agents or commissioners with the power, not of commanding the Army or Navy, but with the power to direct a certain movement of the Army or Navy so far as it affects foreign relations. For instance, the President may invest a civilian with the power to say, "I want you to land troops for this purpose, or to protect the people there." That is a civil duty; that is not a military duty. The military duty is to afford protection; the civil and diplomatic duty is to determine when the protection is needed or may be demanded of the United States.

Mr. HIGGINS. If the Senator will allow me, there is one other question I should like to ask him, and that is, whether he considers that the President had the power to invest Mr. Blount with authority to give orders to and supersede Mr. Stevens as the minister to the Hawaiian Government so long as Mr. Stevens remained the minister there, which, I understand, were given in this case?

Mr. GEORGE. If there is anything settled in constitutional law it is this—and my learned friend, who is a very fine lawyer, if he will go to his works on international law will find it laid down—that the powers of a foreign minister are just such powers, and only such powers, as the President chooses to give him. I call the Senator's attention again to the fact that in 1881, one of the last official acts of his then term of office of one of the greatest Secretaries of State this country has ever produced, Mr. Blaine, was to commission William H. Trescot an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to three courts, at all of which there were regular American ministers, taking from them certain powers which had theretofore been granted to them, and transferring those powers to Mr. Trescot.

Mr. HIGGINS. I should like to ask the Senator if the instructions to Mr. Trescot made him distinctly paramount over those ministers, and ordered them to obey him?

Mr. GEORGE. As to the duties he had to perform he was paramount. He determined what he should do within his instructions, and those other men were allowed to do only what was not transferred to him. But I discussed all that an hour ago. I showed, though the Senator did not do me the honor to listen to what I was saying at the time, that under the peculiar circumstances attending this case, as Mr. Stevens's conduct was to be investigated, it was essential, in order to make the investigation complete, that Mr. Blount should have powers paramount to his. But I pass from that, and I shall not go back to it any more. I wish to speak about the Florida case.

Mr. Monroe, then Secretary of State, wrote to Governor Mitchell, of Georgia, as I have before quoted:

> I inclose you an order from the Secretary of War to the commander of the troops of the United States to evacuate the country when requested so to do by you, and to pay the same respect in future to your order in fulfilling the duties enjoined by the law that he has been expected to do to that of Gen. Matthews.

That was Gen. Matthews, who was his superior officer. I knew when I brought up that precedent before the Senate that the contention would be made just as it has been made by the Senator from Delaware. I knew there was no answer to the precedent. That which comes nearest to being an answer to it is that which the Senator from Delaware is forced to make. I arraign, he says—that is the substance of his argument—not only Mr. Cleveland for a violation of law in the appointment of Mr. Blount and conferring powers on him, but I arraign also James Madison, James Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Ulysses S. Grant, and James G. Blaine. That may be bad company in the opinion of the Senator from Delaware, but in my opinion, Mr. President, the unquestioned acts, the uncriticised acts done by the illustrious men to whom I have referred are proper precedents for the action of an American President.

Mr. President, I have concluded now what I desire to say upon the law points involved. I have very little further to add. It is no part of my present purpose to discuss generally the policy pursued by this Administration in reference to Hawaii. I have discussed only one part of this large and interesting subject—the legality of the action of the President and the necessity for the investigation as committed to Mr. Blount. As I may not, however, have another opportunity of speaking on this subject, it will prevent misconception if I may—in the way of statement merely, not argument—give my views on this subject generally.

I do not doubt, after the best examination I have been able to give the subject, that the committee of safety and Mr. Stevens acted in full concert throughout; that they were both convinced, and on that conviction acted, that no movement to supplant the Queen had the slightest chance of success unless aided by Mr. Stevens and the United States forces; that in pursuance of this mutual conviction the United States forces were by preconcert landed at the opportune moment to render the needed aid, and were stationed exactly at the place selected previously, not by the commander of the forces, not by Mr. Stevens, but by the revolutionary committee of safety, as the most convenient for assisting by their mere presence in accomplishing this overthrow; that this landing and stationing were wholly unnecessary to protect American life and property; that such protection or the need for such protection is an afterthought.

It was not even alluded to in the paper which the committee of safety sent to Stevens asking for troops, and on which he admits in his letter to Mr. Foster that he acted. This landing and stationing of troops was wholly unnecessary to protect American life and property, but resulted wholly from the appeal of the committee of safety for troops to protect them, not to protect American life and American property. They appealed to Stevens for aid to protect themselves. Mr. Stevens did give them the protection they asked. There was not a single attempt, nor was there expressed to Mr. Stevens by this committee the fear of any such attempt to injure a single hair on the head of an American citizen or to destroy a single dollar's worth of property of an American citizen. The appeal they made, and on which Stevens admits he acted, was an appeal to protect their own persons in their preconcerted efforts with Stevens to overthrow the Queen's Government.

Sir, the recognition of the so called de facto government shows that it was not a sincere acknowledgment of an existing and accomplished fact, but was made when the revolution was as yet incomplete; in fact when it was scarcely known in the city of Honolulu as having commenced. The recognition, as the proof shows, was made in pursuance of an agreement which had been made by Stevens with the revolutionary committee, or the committee of safety, "When you get into possession of that building and read a proclamation there establishing a government, I will recognize you." Instead of being the recognition of an accomplished fact, it was designed and actually had the effect to bring about the de facto situation which it pretended to recognize as a government. It was one of the instrumentalities which had been agreed upon between the revolutionary committee and Stevens to be used in the overthrow of the Queen's Government. Without going into an argument I may say it is proven beyond any reasonable doubt that the recognition at the time it was made was in fact the main instrumentality in overthrowing the Queen. The other instrumentality was the presence of United States troops, put there for that purpose.

I avow my conviction also that even with this aid in securing a surrender by the Queen the Provisional Government was too weak to stand alone, and needed, as was shown, and received the fostering care and support of United States Minister Stevens. The revolutionary government was not only unable, as is proven as clear by this evidence as is the noonday sun, to accomplish the revolution without the aid of Stevens and the United States forces, but after they had succeeded in getting an abdication from the Queen it was so weak that it could not stand alone; it could not perform the functions of a government except relying upon and aided by the United States forces.

So, as I have shown, with the United States forces on shore charged with the duty of maintaining order, which meant to suppress any attempt to overthrow the Queen, within twelve days after the so-called revolution was accomplished, we find the Provisional Government making an appeal to Stevens to assume a protectorate over them upon the ground—let us speak plainly about it—that the sham government which Stevens had set up there was unable to perform the ordinary functions of government; it could not protect life, liberty, or property. What sort of a machine is that for a government which can neither protect the good and orderly nor punish the disorderly? That was their exact condition twelve days after this alleged accomplished fact, this de facto government.

Mr. GRAY. According to their own confession and not that of anybody else.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course, according to their own confession. I am glad the Senator from Delaware reminded me of it. It is not a picture drawn by an unfriendly hand, but a solemn confession made by the Government itself in the most solemn of all possible public papers, a paper proposing to transfer the possession of the Kingdom to another country, acknowledging their inability to preserve order, and asking the protection of that foreign Government to do it.

I avow also my conviction that in fact the Government thus established has exhibited little, if any, other vitality or power than the assumption that it could transfer to the United States, against the will of the people, the sovereignty of that country. That is about all that has been done. It was put up by Stevens, a provisional government, to exist only until annexation could be accomplished. It begged Stevens to assume a protectorate over them, and at the same time it negotiates with the Government of the United States for a transfer of the sovereignty of that country to this. That is the spectacle which this situation exhibits to the American people and to the world, and a most miserable spectacle it is.

Then, Mr. President, lastly, to show that this Provisional Government is driven to these straits of confession of weakness, they send commissioners to the United States to treat for annexation, and those commissioners in their letter proposing the annexation state as the main ground on which they desire annexation, that they are incapable of taking care of themselves, and ask the Government of the United States to do it.

LOAN OF CONDEMNED GUNS AND PROJECTILES.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1683) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend condemned cannon and cannon balls to the association having in charge the monument erected on Government land near Chicago, Ill., to the Confederate dead there buried, to report it with amendments and submit a report thereon. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be now considered. It is a bill in which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] feels considerable interest, and I know he would like very much to have it now passed by the Senate.

Mr. FAULKNER. It is to be considered with the understanding, I suppose, that the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly. The bill will lead to no debate. It is a very simple matter.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, to strike out all of the bill after the word "to" in line 3, and insert:

Issue four condemned iron guns and projectiles to the officer in charge of the Government lot in Oakwood Cemetery, near Chicago, Ill., in which are buried both Union and Confederate dead, and that he be authorized to expend them in ornamenting said lot.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue four condemned iron guns and projectiles to the officer in charge of the Government lot in Oakwood Cemetery, near Chicago, Ill., in which are buried both Union and Confederate dead, and that he be authorized to expend them in ornamenting said lot.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee also reports to strike out the preamble. The preamble will be stricken out, if there be no objection.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of War to issue four condemned iron guns and projectiles to the officer in charge of the Government lot in Oakwood Cemetery, near Chicago, Ill."

HAWAIIAN BARK ARCTIC.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 286) for the relief of the owners and crew of the Hawaiian bark Arctic.

Mr. FAULKNER. I will make no objection, provided the Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for this purpose.

Mr. HOAR. I make that request. I understood that it would not displace the unfinished business.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to the owners or their legal representatives of the vessel or bark Arctic $23,500, in full compensation for the losses sustained and the services rendered by them in abandoning their business of whale catching and rescuing one hundred and seventy-six seamen in the Arctic Sea.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORMS OF DEEDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 832) to simplify the form of deeds of conveyance, trust, and releases of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], to add a proviso to section 4 of the bill, which will be read.

Mr. FAULKNER. If it is agreeable to the Senate, because of the few Senators present, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may go over until to-morrow, as the bill is now pending upon a vote on the amendment, so that other matters Senators are interested in can be taken up at this time, the bill retaining its place as the unfinished business.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LAND-SCRIP LOCATIONS.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill (H. R. 73) supplementary to the act of Congress approved January 28, 1879, entitled "An act defining the manner in which certain land scrip may be assigned and located or applied by actual settlers, and providing for the issue of patents in the name of the locator or his legal representatives," is an entirely unobjectionable bill. The bill has been read. It was brought up when it was reported, I think, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], not understanding it, objected to its present consideration. It does not affect the title to a square foot of ground. It simply allows patents to be issued for land scrip legally located before the passage of a certain act, the same as patents for land scrip located afterwards, it being an omission in the original act. It is a House bill, and its passage is recommended by the Committee on Public Lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for information.

Mr. DOLPH. It has been read, but let it again be read for information, so that the Senate may understand it. It is very short.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill merely applies to valid locations. It does not validate anything.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CALL. I think the bill ought to be carefully considered. The phraseology ought to be very definite as to what the Land Department may decide to be a valid location. Under the decision of the Supreme Court that is a question of considerable importance. Seeing that the Land Department has already conveyed away a vast domain, it seems to me we ought to be very careful about confiding that authority to them.

Mr. DOLPH. This is a House bill. It passed the other House without objection and it was reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands without objection. It does not confirm title to a foot of land. It merely cures an inadvertence in the act of 1879, which authorizes patents to be issued for locations by this scrip; but it was held in the Department that it only applied to locations afterwards, and not where there had been previous valid locations. The bill merely provides that on a previous valid location patents may be issued the same as on those after the passage of that act. This is all there is in the bill. It does not give anybody a title to a foot of land or a right to acquire title to a foot of real estate. It is simply a matter relating to the transaction of business in the Department, and to facilitate that business.

Mr. CALL. I think the bill ought to be very carefully considered. The fact that it has passed the other House, and the fact that the Committee on Public Lands has reported it are not at all material. The question is whether the vast body of the public domain shall be located under perhaps unlawful locations, which may be ratified or confirmed by some inadvertent language in the bill. That has been done to a vast extent, and many millions of acres of land have been taken away from the homesteaders and the homestead law nullified by language inserted in bills of this description which escaped the notice of anyone at the time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that there is objection to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask leave to submit a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DOLPH. I want to know if the Senator from Florida objects to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CALL. I do.

Mr. DOLPH. I am glad to know it.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE LILLY.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the Hon. William Lilly, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, 8,000 copies; of which number 2,000 copies shall be delivered to the Senators and Representatives of the State of Pennsylvania, which shall include 50 copies to be bound in full morocco, to be delivered to the family of the deceased, and of the remaining, 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives; and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to have engraved and printed a portrait of the said William Lilly to accompany the said eulogies.

GEOLOGICAL SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution providing for printing the report of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, to report it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. Let the substitute be read.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed at the Government Printing Office, in addition to the number already ordered by law, 7,000 copies of the fourteenth annual report of the Director of the United States Geological Survey, uniform with the preceding volumes of the series, of which number 1,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 for distribution by the Geological Survey.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in the nature of a substitute reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I submit reports giving the cost in each of these cases, and ask that the reports be printed in the usual document form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

THE RUSSIAN THISTLE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 1545) to provide for the destruction and extermination of the noxious plant or weed known as Russian thistle or Russian cactus, technically salsola kali tragus.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to the fact that the Senate is very thin, and that that is a very important bill. It involves a principle which has never been settled, so far as I know, by any legislation. The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was divided on the bill; and whilst I want the Senator to understand that I shall not interpose any factious or dilatory objection to the consideration of the bill, yet as it involves precedents of a very important character, I think it ought to be considered when the Senate is full and fully debated. It proposes to do what never has been done before, to make an appropriation of about a million dollars, I believe.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. One million dollars.

Mr. GEORGE. It proposes to make an appropriation of $1,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of eradicating from certain States a noxious weed. It is an important bill. I should like the Senator to ask and the Senate to consent that the bill be made a special order for a particular day named, at an early hour, when the Senate will be full and when it may be maturely considered. Of course, I am opposed to the bill, but I have no objection to its passage if after full and free deliberation and debate a majority of the Senate shall so decide. I suggest to my friend that he ask that the bill be made a special order on a particular day, in the morning, when the Senate is full, so that the matter may be maturely and fully considered. The Senate is not full now, and it can not pass the bill, because it can not be passed except on a yea-and-nay vote. I do not want to object to its consideration, because I wish to accommodate the Senator from North Dakota as much as I can.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. There are many special orders at the present time, and in view of the fact that the tariff bill is set for the 2d of April, I am a little apprehensive if we do not take up the bill now and consider it upon its merits we shall not reach it at the present session. It is a very important measure to the great agricultural interests of the West. The farmers of at least seven agricultural States of the Western country are interested in the passage of the bill, and they are very anxious to know whether Congress intends to do anything in the matter. I think that the Senator from Mississippi will agree with me that we can at least begin the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course we can begin it, but we can not conclude it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I am aware of that fact. I should like to have the discussion entered upon at least.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, March 21, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

The Chair announces the appointment of Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. SAYERS. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

DELEGATE FOR DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA IN THE HOUSE.

LIGHT SHIP WITH FOG SIGNAL OFF BOSTON LIGHT, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. BRICKNER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported favorably the bill (H. chusetts; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Y.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PORTRAIT OF DOLLY MADISON.

Mr. COMPTON, from the Committee on the Library, reported back favorably the joint resolution (H. Res. 142) for the purchase of the portrait of Dolly Madison from E. S. Andrews; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of committees.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 2640) for the relief of Brig. Gen. John R. Brooke, United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. 5529) to repeal section 311 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to accounts of the Treasury of the United States.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. LESTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized.

[Mr. SIMPSON withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. SAYERS. I ask now that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] be allowed five minutes; and then, if no other gentleman wishes to speak, I will ask for the vote.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I take the floor at this moment in order that I may in the five minutes allotted me correct one or two inaccuracies and make a brief reply to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON]. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SAYERS] spoke yesterday of the item appropriating $31,000 for outdoor relief and incidental expenses; and he commented upon the fact that the vouchers returned showed an expenditure of only $1,000 for outside relief. He intimated that in his judgment a larger amount should have been expended in transferring the soldiers to the homes. The fact is that the item of transportation is an entirely distinct item; and the appropriation for incidental expenses has been expended for many years as set out in the proposed amendatory law, and detailed vouchers have been forwarded to the Treasury Department for each one of those items, just as the committee themselves in substance propose shall continue to be done.

The outdoor relief fund is used in this way: When an old man of the service is in need of a meal's victuals, it is paid for by the manager; and then the manager is reimbursed for that expenditure. But when men are to be transported to their homes, the payment for that comes out of an entirely different fund. So it happens that the amounts disbursed in these minor ways for meals and immediate relief are comparatively insignificant.

The second point to which I call attention is the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL], that the president of the Board, in his examination before the subcommittee, intimated or said that the audit, which was being made at his office, was useless. What he meant to say, as he explained clearly afterward, was that it is useless to divide the accounts into sixty-six different accounts, instead of leaving them in seven. He objected to thus multiplying the extent and cost of the audit, and stated that so much of the regulations of the statute as provides for dividing these seven accounts into sixty-six is useless.

I send to the Clerk's desk to be read an article from a paper of this morning. Before it is read I will say that during the discussion yesterday I announced that in the course of the expenditure of $60,000,000, extending through twenty-five years, we have had to resort to the law but twice to secure our rights against the Treasurer's subtreasurers.

The Clerk read as follows:

SETTLED BY HIS ESTATE—GEN. BUTLER'S ADMINISTRATORS VIRTUALLY ADMIT WHAT HE DENIED.

BOSTON, March 19.

The case of the National Home for Disabled Soldiers against the late Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, which has been pending in the United States circuit court, has been settled by the payment of $18,000 by the administrators of his estate.

The suit was first brought in 1885, and since that time has been tried once and argued before the Supreme Court of the United States on exceptions.

The case was originally brought in the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in 1885, and in the declaration filed at that time the plaintiffs claimed that Gen. Butler owed them $15,000, which was money loaned and sent to Gen. William S. Tilton, acting secretary of the eastern branch of the home at Togus, Me. The defendant at that time was acting treasurer of the corporation.

The plaintiffs also claimed that the amount was repaid by Gen. Tilton to Gen. Butler, and the payment has not been accounted for by Gen. Butler.

The answer filed by Gen. Butler denied the claim of the plaintiff, and said that he paid in full all moneys and sums which at any time he ever owed the corporation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that the gentleman from Illinois be allowed five minutes additional.

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] claim that the payment of that money by the representatives of Gen. Butler is an admission that Gen. Butler owed the money?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. What I meant to say was that there have been but two suits necessarily instituted during eighteen years against the securities of the treasurers; that one of these was a suit against Gen. Butler, which has just been settled by his personal representatives, leaving the second suit pending, which is a suit involving only about $300. My point in citing these two cases was to show how clear the administration has been in its fiscal affairs.

Now, in regard to the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] as to the admission of officers of the regular Army into the Leavenworth Home from posts in Kansas, I will say that the law of July 5, 1884——

Mr. SIMPSON. I think I said "privates."

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Officers and privates, I understood the gentleman to say.

Mr. SIMPSON. I meant privates.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. The law of July 5, 1884, authorizing the establishment of the Leavenworth branch amplifies the law which had previously existed, and by its fifth section authorizes the admission to national homes of honorably discharged soldiers and sailors who had served in the war of the rebellion, whether they subsequently served in the regular Army or not. So that, after having served in the war of the rebellion, and having been honorably discharged, men are entitled to the benefits of the homes even though they may be regular Army officers or soldiers. I am not aware of any case in which any officer or private of the regular Army has been admitted to any of the soldiers' homes unless he had been in the war of the rebellion and honorably discharged.

Mr. SIMPSON. In the case I referred to, the men are now in the regular Army as enlisted soldiers, stationed at Fort Riley, Kansas. That is the point.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. On that point I will say to the gentleman that the statement as yet rests in rumor; and whatever the facts may be, the matter will be carefully examined by the Board at its next meeting. The investigation by the Board of Managers of the affair spoken of by the gentleman was like any other matter submitted to a competent tribunal; it was passed upon by the Board last year, and the majority vote of the Board decided two things: First, that it was not shown the governor had been corruptly influenced; he denied it most strenuously; the majority of the Board voted that in the single instance which was attempted to be specified the matter was not established by proof to their satisfaction; and they therefore found that he was not guilty of having sold his influence for corrupt purposes.

The second branch of the subject is this: We discovered, and it was the unanimous belief of the Board, that three or four years prior to the time of the investigation the governor had been offensive, that he had been drunk; but a year and a half before the investigation began the governor had established a reform in his own person and in the camp; and after he had established that reform he had become an earnest and zealous worker in the cause of temperance. The result is shown by the fact that to-day he is the national president of all the Keeley leagues in the United States, and we felt that the quality of human mercy ought not to be so strained against that when a man has been guilty of offenses in the long past he should forever be punished for them, and especially as he seemed at the head of a great temperance movement in the homes we let him pass. He has not sinned since the time he reformed. He is to-day an active and earnest worker in the cause of temperance. And now, with a single other statement in kindly correction of the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON], I will let this matter pass.

The saloon that the gentleman from Kansas speaks of is not a saloon where spirituous liquors are sold. It is what is called the beer hall, which is run at all the branches of the home, one where beer is sold to the men and paid for by them, guaranteed to be of a good quality and subject to inspection. That my personal judgment has been against the establishment of that hall is true, but the majority of the Board believed that with the habits that many of these volunteer soldiers had, with the contracted disorders of a quarter of a century, the habits of a lifetime upon them, it was better that there should be a regulated institution, a beer hall inside of the homes, where a clean, wholesome beverage could be sold, rather than that these men, driven out by their impulses, their appetites, and their passions, should seek on the outside an inferior quality of liquor. We recognized the fact that the servitude of fifty years' appetite can not be broken by the institutions themselves.

With one further statement on that point, I dismiss it. The homes, in their system of beer halls, have been copied by the regular Army in its canteen system; so that every post in the United States that chooses, where troops are gathered for any length of time, may have its garrison canteen. These canteens were established by order of Gen. J. C. Kelton; the recent Adjutant-General of the Army of the United States, who gave the most careful study to the subject, who acted only as the friend of the soldier, as he earnestly believed, and who is known to-day among the men under his charge in the last years of his life at the National Home here, as the soldiers' friend.

It is true that I differed with him. It is true that I differed with a majority of the gentlemen of the Board of Managers as to the wisdom of establishing these beer halls, but I bowed to the will of the majority, and it was theirs. And according to the testimony of the officers of the home, the various branches of the homes have been saved from great drunkenness and trouble, and the difficulties arising from arrests of inmates, and the old men themselves have been saved from being plucked whenever they got outside of the lines of the home by having a beer hall established inside the home.

Mr. COGSWELL. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] allow me in his time to say that the committee, after the most careful investigation, had no unkind criticisms to make of the administration of these homes, and the Inspector-General, after a careful investigation, commended the administration as now carried on by the Board of Managers. The only criticism was as to the method of accounting, which he thought might be improved.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I am very much obliged to the gentleman.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy the time of the committee but a very few moments, and would not even speak now but for the fact that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] in his remarks has acquitted one member of the subcommittee who prepared this legislation, but has omitted to acquit other members of that subcommittee, of hostility to the soldiers' homes. The very fact of his acquitting one member and omitting to acquit the other members places those other members who are not so fortunate as to receive his commendation in a wrong position, not only before the House, but before the country.

I desire to say that in the preparation of this portion of the sundry civil bill it was a pleasure to me as chairman of the subcommittee to ask that Gen. COGSWELL of Massachusetts, himself a soldier, should report to the subcommittee his views touching appropriations for the soldiers' homes. He did so, and in connection with that report he also reported the legislation which appears on the sundry civil bill.

I will further say that after a careful consideration of this legislation, it met not only the cordial approval of myself, but also the cordial approval of every other member of the committee; and, as has frequently been said, this legislation was in no sense of the word intended to be hostile toward these homes, but rather to regulate the rapid settlement of their accounts.

Now, let me recur briefly to the language of the two clauses that have been complained of. Remember that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK], one of the members of the Board, gives his cordial assent to all this legislation, except the two paragraphs to which he has raised points of order.

What are these clauses? In the first place it is proposed to put the treasurers of these homes upon the very same footing with every disbursing officer of the United States. That is to say, we require these treasurers to execute bonds to the Government of the United States, to be approved of by the Secretary of War. But, Mr. Chairman, who is it that appoints these treasurers? Does the Secretary of War appoint them? On the contrary, they are appointed by the Board of Managers, and are required to execute such bonds as shall be approved by the Secretary of War.

They are required to render their accounts monthly, so that they may be audited rapidly and that Congress and the executive branch of the Government may know how the large sum of money which is annually appropriated for the support of these homes has been expended. Can there be a valid objection to that?

Again, the gentleman demurs to the proposition that these accounts shall be rendered monthly to such bureau of the War Department as the Secretary of War may designate. It is well understood that these accounts already go to the Department; and all that is required by the pending provision is that these same accounts, instead of coming in later, shall go monthly to a bureau of the War Department.

In regard to the paragraph embraced between line 16 on page 84 and line 2 on page 85, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman complains that if this clause were adopted the Board would not be able to visit and inspect the homes as now. I do not admit that as a legal proposition; but, admitting it for the sake of argument to be true, the gentleman will admit that on yesterday I proposed to him to obviate that objection by inserting at the end of the clause the following words:

But nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the Board visiting the homes as often during the year as they may deem necessary under existing law.

So that we would have most cheerfully freed this clause from his objection.

With this statement, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling upon the points of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BLACK] made a point of order upon the paragraph commencing at line 7, on page 83, and ending with line 2, page 84: also on that paragraph commencing on page 84, at line 16, and ending with line 2, on page 85. The point is that this paragraph is not in accordance with Rule XXI of the House, in that it changes existing law and makes new legislation. The Chair is of the opinion that the provision of the paragraph requiring the giving of a sufficient bond to the United States in such sum as the Secretary of War may direct is a change in the existing law upon the subject; at least it makes new law that did not exist in that respect. Therefore the Chair considers it obnoxious to Rule XXI, and sustains the point of order; and that paragraph must be stricken out.

As to the second, that is more apparently contrary to the rule, inasmuch as it repeals a section of the Revised Statutes and repeals all the laws that require the Board to audit and examine accounts. The Chair thinks, therefore, that this paragraph is contrary to the rule, and sustains the point of order upon it; and this paragraph also must be stricken out.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, in pursuance of an order of the committee last evening, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] is to be recognized for thirty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that on yesterday evening, by unanimous consent, the committee made an order that after the disposition of these paragraphs certain members should address the House for a certain time upon the bill generally, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD]. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, last Wednesday an amendment was offered, nominally to the pending bill, but actually to the land law of the United States. It should interest the members from every State that has public lands yet to dispose of. In the judgment of many of us, neither the pertinency of the amendment nor the merits of the case would justify its passage at this time.

As representing a State especially interested in the proposed amendment, I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Montana (Mr. HARTMAN).

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Chairman, recurring to the remarks which I had occasion to make on last Friday relative to the amendment introduced by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], I desire to add a few words to what I then stated, presenting to the committee the facts as they exist with reference to one case which will be affected by the amendment which has been thus incorporated upon this appropriation bill. I refer to the facts in the case of Graham against Campbell, affecting the southeast quarter of section 10, township 20 north, range 4 east, in Cascade County, in the State of Montana. The facts, briefly epitomized as to the location, entry, proof, and the subsequent transfer of that property I have before me. I will briefly present them to the committee.

Archibald C. Campbell made preemption cash entry No. 1373, for southeast quarter of section 10, township 20 north, range 4 east, October 17, 1883, when final certificate issued to him for the land.

May 13, 1887, James Graham filed his affidavit of contest.

August 19, 1887, the Commissioner of the General Land Office ordered a hearing on the charges made, which were that Campbell had not, as shown in his final proof, made the land his home for the period of six months required by law, and that his entry was made for the use and benefit of other persons than himself.

October 10, 1887, Graham made affidavit that Campbell was deceased and that there were no heirs. Notice was by publication.

Testimony was taken between October 28, 1887, and January 6, 1888.

November 9, 1888, the register and receiver rendered their decision, holding that the contestant had failed to substantiate his charges by proof, and recommending the dismissal of the contest.

The contestant appealed, and on November 25, 1890, the Acting Commissioner of the General Land Office rendered his decision, reaching the same conclusion as the register and receiver and holding that the contest should be dismissed.

December 19, 1890, Graham filed a motion for the review and reconsideration of this decision, and on February 25, 1891, Commissioner Stone granted said motion, held that he was satisfied from the evidence that Campbell had not resided on the land in good faith, and hence that his entry should be canceled, but found that the charges that his entry was made for the benefit of another were not sustained.

The act of March 3, 1891, having been passed, the transferees of Campbell applied for the issue of patent under its provisions, contending that by reason of bona fide purchase prior to March 1, 1888, and after the issue of final certificate, the entry stands confirmed.

For various reasons action upon this motion could not be had in the General Land Office during the late Administration, and in the meantime those interested in the contest endeavored to obtain legislation from Congress which would destroy the effect of the act of 1891. They failed when the provision was stricken out of the sundry civil appropriation bill by the Senate and House on March 3 last.

I want to say that that effort was made in exactly the same way that this effort was made, by attaching this modification of the public land laws upon an appropriation bill.

When Commissioner Lamoreux took charge of the General Land Office his attention was called to the pending motion, and the case received his personal consideration, resulting in his decision of November 15, 1893, wherein he held that the proofs under the act of 1891 were satisfactory and sufficient, and that—

Under the circumstances, said entry is declared confirmed by said act, and the contest is dismissed.

I use his exact words. "Under the circumstances, said entry is declared confirmed by said act, and the contest dismissed."

I ask the attention of the committee particularly to the words which I have just quoted.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Will the gentleman here allow me to ask if an appeal was taken from that decision?

Mr. HARTMAN. If the gentleman will kindly retain his seat, I will give him the entire history of it and that will show the appeal.

December 14, 1893, motion was filed for the review and reconsideration of this decision. At the same time counsel for Graham requested the Commissioner to set a day for an oral argument of the case before him.

The Commissioner declined by letter of January 2, 1894, to Messrs. Buttz and others representing Graham, saying that—

An oral argument would involve a discussion of the whole case upon its merits. The time which such a discussion would necessarily consume is, in my opinion, greater than can now be granted consistently with the pressure of other important matters of public business.

For this reason, and from the further fact that the case is one which has already received my careful investigation and consideration, I am constrained to deny your request for an oral argument.

The Commissioner however granted counsel fifteen days within which to submit a brief in support of the motion for review.

The brief was thereupon filed within the time limited, and on February 13, 1894, the Commissioner denied the motion, adhering to his former decision.

February 15, 1894, Graham filed an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, who has not yet decided the case.

Here are the transfers of land held by bona fide purchasers for value, innocent purchasers, and this is only one of a large number of cases that will be affected adversely if this amendment is adopted. The transfers of the land prior to March 1, 1888, were as follows:

October 20, 1883, warranty deed of the whole tract from Campbell to Timothy E. Collins, consideration $1,000.

January 2, 1884, Collins and wife to Robert Vaughn and Paris Gibson.

October 26, 1886, warranty deed from Vaughn and wife to James J. Hill, an undivided half interest.

February 23, 1887, Gibson to James J. Hill, undivided half interest.

July 19, 1887, James J. Hill and wife to the Great Falls Water Power and Town Site Company.

It will be observed that these transfers were all made before a hearing was ordered by the Commissioner of the General Land Office on the Graham contest, and before any notice of the existence of said contest had been served.

It was shown to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of the General Land Office that the purchasers seeking confirmation of the entry had no notice or knowledge of any kind that Campbell had not in all respects complied with the legal requirements.

Now, it will be observed that the existing law to which I called attention last Friday, the act of March 3, 1891, absolutely confirmed in the transferees of all parties which were proved under the faith of law, a vested right to the land. What is the effect of this amendment? Its effect is to absolutely upset and unsettle the titles of those innocent purchasers for value. What else does it do? It says to the contestant: "You may have an opportunity to come in here, notwithstanding the fact that you have nothing but a contest pending—you may have an opportunity to come in here and reinaugurate that contest, and if successful in it, you may have thirty days preference right to locate the land, and then you may go to those innocent purchasers, who have purchased or encumbered the land for value, and say to them: 'Put up your good money to us or we will cloud your titles forever and involve you in endless litigation.'"

That is the purpose of it. It has been lobbied in this House by one Butts, a man who is interested, who is entitled to the privileges of the floor by reason of being an ex-member, and who has used them for the purposes of lobbying for this measure. I undertake to say that it is an infamous outrage upon this House that this thing is permitted to be done. Understand, I do not say that the gentleman from Indiana has acted otherwise than in good faith. I make no reflection upon him, but that he has been outrageously imposed upon there can be no doubt whatever. I undertake to say that if he knew that this man was an interested party, the agent of a syndicate who are attempting to cloud titles and then to go around to the bona fide settlers saying, "We will quitclaim to you if you will pay us enough money," he would not advocate this provision.

I want to know if this House is willing to put its seal of approval upon conduct of that kind? Now, Mr. Chairman, we who are interested in this matter and who have watched it as the representatives of the bona fide purchasers, had a right to believe, when this bill was introduced and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, that we would have been met here with the report of that committee so that we might have had a square-toed, manly fight on the merits of the question, and not that it would come in here as an amendment to an obscure paragraph of a general appropriation bill.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I desire to reserve the remainder of my time until I hear what can be said in justification of this provision.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman [Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota] has consumed his time, I will occupy the attention of the committee briefly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota has not used all his time. He has twenty minutes remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman ought to consume his time.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I think this side ought to have the privilege of hearing what is to be said in support of this provision. We do not care to use up all our time until we hear from the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota desire to consume the remainder of his time?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. No, sir, I do not. I believe I have a right to reserve some time until I hear from the affirmative on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was given thirty minutes by the order.

Mr. HOLMAN. How much of it has been consumed?

The CHAIRMAN. Ten minutes. The gentleman from Minnesota has twenty minutes left.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] thinks proper to proceed now, I will yield him ten minutes.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I have no interest in this amendment, but I am a member of the Public Lands Committee and was authorized by that committee to make a unanimous report in favor of its adoption. The bill, as I understand it, is intended to give relief to contestants who have been deprived of their rights by the seventh section of a law passed in the dying hours of the Fifty-first Congress. As I understand the matter, there were three members of this House and three of the Senate to whom, as conferees, that bill was referred, and after a thorough investigation of the matter they reached an agreement, and did not intend to affect the claims of contestants, but that those claims should stand just as they were prior to the passage of the bill. According to my understanding of this matter, there is a large land company up in Montana that has gotten possession of between five and six million dollars' worth of land by buying land scrip and hiring settlers to go upon the land under the homestead law, many of those settlers remaining only a few weeks on those lands.

Mr. HOLMAN. Under the preëmption law, I think.

Mr. LATIMER. Going upon the land under the preëmption law, and selling their claims to this Great Falls Water Power Company. As I understand it, this company were in full possession of all the facts and knew exactly the kind of claims they were buying. Then other parties coming along and finding the land vacant went in under the homestead law and claimed these lands, and under the law of 1880 they had a right to contest the claims of the parties whose claims had been bought by the Water Power Company. These contested cases, many of them, were decided in favor of the contestants by the Land Department, and the titles went to patent. As I understand it there were only about twenty-five cases pending prior to the present administration of the Land Department.

There is only one case now that we know of, the Graham case. This man Graham, who has been referred to by my friend from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN], filed his claim and went before the Land Office, and the claim was decided in his favor; but pending the appeal the law was passed by the Fifty-first Congress, which set aside his claim, for under that law, as construed by the Commissioner of the Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior, even where frauds are proven to have existed, the claims of the contestants are set aside. For example, if this Water Falls and Land Company were to buy a piece of land from a man who had obtained it fraudulently, that fraud could not be investigated; the company must be considered an innocent purchaser, and the patent must issue.

Mr. TAWNEY. Does not the act of 1891 expressly except cases where fraud had been perpetrated?

Mr. LATIMER. As I understand the matter, even where fraud has been proven, it does not enter into the case at all. If the purchaser of the land can prove that there was no fraud in his purchase, though it was bought from a fraudulent claimant, the original fraud does not enter into the matter. That law was passed in the dying hours of the Fifty-first Congress without being fully understood; for, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has stated, it was not intended or understood by five of the conferees that it should bear the interpretation that has been placed upon it. Only one member of the committee understood its effect to be as the Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior have construed it. That law has thrown these contestants out of court entirely, and all that we propose here is to place them back where they were when the law was enacted.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is it not a fact that the law, which you say was understood by only one member of the conference committee was agreed to by the entire committee, of which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was a member?

Mr. LATIMER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] and the other conferees, whose testimony we had before our committee, stated that they did not agree to or understand its effect as the Land Department has construed it.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that a statement of the facts submitted before our committee and upon which we reached our conclusion be read from the Clerk's desk, so that gentlemen may understand all the facts in the case.

Mr. HARTMAN. Is it not a fact that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office have both reported adversely upon the identical proposition which is presented here?

Mr. LATIMER. You have already put that statement into the RECORD. We do not deny that they have put their construction upon the law; but we claim that it was unjust, and that five of the conference committee repudiated the construction put upon that seventh section by the Commissioner of the Land Office.

Mr. HARTMAN. Then, why was not the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office mentioned in the report of the committee?

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LATIMER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the testimony which I have sent be read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. May I interrupt the gentleman for a question?

Mr. LATIMER. I do not yield for a question.

The statement referred to above was read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1894.

SIR: As the Public Lands Committee, of which you are a member, authorized (unanimously) you to report favorably H. R. 4458, a bill to save the contest cases that were pending in the Interior Department on 3d day of March, 1891, at the time the act repealing timber-culture and preëmption laws was passed, and the bill you reported having been placed on the 14th instant in the sundry civil bill as an amendment thereto, and as the Washington attorneys, Burdett, Thompson & Law, of the Great Falls Water Power and Town-site Company of Montana, have sent a law brief and circular letter to every member of Congress on the subject, and caused the letters of the Secretary and Commissioner of the Interior Department to be inserted in the RECORD, I believe I am justified in sending you a statement of facts showing what is involved in the whole matter. About all the cases that were pending in the Department have long since been passed to patent, with the exception of the case of James Graham vs. The Great Falls Water Power and Town-site Company. This case is still pending under appeal before the Secretary, and the whole fight is virtually over this quarter section, involving not more than 160 acres.

James Graham, the plaintiff, won his case before the act of March 3, 1891, was passed; that is, on the 25th of January, 1891 (a short time before Mr. Carter become Commissioner). Assistant Commissioner Stone decided the so-called final proof made by A. C. Campbell was false and fraudulent. The allegation in the complaint was that Campbell, the defendant, was one of the hired settlers and acting for the corporation in acquiring this land. The corporation having lost, they were allowed sixty days to appeal from the Commissioner's decision to the Secretary, but they did not appeal. Before the sixty days expired the seventh section was inserted by the conferees in the repealing act, which seventh section, as construed by the Interior Department, ratified and confirmed all the fraudulent entries, notwithstanding the plaintiff had proven the frauds, expended his money, and won his case before the Commissioner. Five of the conferees have repudiated the construction given by the Department of the Interior upon the seventh section, leaving only one member of that conference committee [Senator PETTIGREW] who is quiet on the "quieting title" of the seventh section.

Judge HOLMAN on the 14th instant explained on the floor of the House the views of all the conferees except those of Senator PETTIGREW.

Some six years ago, when Graham commenced his contest for this quarter section of land, it was of little value, being about 3 miles from the town of Great Falls; but since then, and while this contest is pending, the land has become valuable, and the town-site company, with the $5,000,000 of capital, are making this fight to hold it.

Very respectfully,

C. W. BUTTZ,
Of Buttzville, N. Dak., Attorney for James Graham.

Hon. A. C. LATIMER.

STATEMENT MADE TO THE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC LANDS.

Before the year 1884 no settlement, except by roving stock raisers, had been made upon the public lands on the upper Missouri River, in Montana, at and about the Great Falls. The water power at that place is great and very valuable. About this time a syndicate, or combination, was formed, consisting in part of Messrs. Gibson, Collins, Broadwater, Hill, and others, to acquire title to public lands, on each side of the river at and for many miles around about said falls. There were only two ways that they could obtain the public lands in large quantities. They could purchase land scrip, which had become very high and scarce, or they could contract with and place upon the land a class of men called "settlers," taking a contract or deed from them with date left blank, to fill in after final entry or proof was made. This latter course was the cheapest and the one adopted, with very few exceptions, as two 80-acre tracts at the immediate ends of the Great Falls, and perhaps one or two other pieces more valuable than the other lands (that it was not considered safe to trust hired settlers to acquire) were obtained by Sioux half-breed scrip.

At the commencement they covered a large portion of that country with filings under the desert-land laws, which allowed them to hold the land for three years without doing anything in the way of expenditure of money, and during this time they caused them to be surveyed, and arranged to acquire title to the same lands through settlers under the preemption and homestead laws, as the cost of $1.25 per acre under the preemption and homestead laws, was much less than to acquire title under the more expensive desert-land laws, under which last-named law title could not be acquired until after three years had expired, while under the preemption and homestead laws title could be acquired after six months' so-called residence.

As fast as the right kind of "trustworthy" settlers could be obtained the desert land entries were relinquished.

As soon as this syndicate was ready to have the country opened up for settlement under the preemption and homestead laws they obtained a modification of an order of the Interior Department which had designated that section of the country as subject to entry under the desert-land laws.

This syndicate laid out the town site of Great Falls, established a newspaper, opened up a bank, owned and controlled everything. They obtained a contract to have the public land surveyed with H. P. Rolph, as surveyor, who was also their local attorney for the syndicate, and attorney for their class of "settlers," making out their filing papers and their final proof papers; and as fast as the land was surveyed settlers were placed upon them, although a large number of their most trusted employés were located upon the lands previous to their being surveyed, such men as Matkins, who was their deputy postmaster, Webster, who was their secretary or clerk, and many others first entered lands under the preemption laws, make proo in six months convey, and relocate under the homestead laws, prove up under the commutation clause of the homestead laws in six months thereafter, and convey again.

Thus in three or four years the syndicate, by the system they had adopted, acquired title to about $6,000,000 worth of the public lands. On the 9th day of May, 1887, this syndicate of "land grabbers" incorporated under the laws of Montana, fixing their capital stock at $5,000,000.

That one member of the syndicate furnished a large portion or nearly all of the money required to obtain the land, and after being conveyed to "go-betweens" then by them conveyed to him who had furnished the money, and that soon thereafter (they incorporated, fixing their capital stock at $5,000,000) to wit: On the 19th day of July, in 1887, Mr. Hill in one deed conveyed a large portion of the land so acquired, to wit, $5,000,000 worth to said corporation, of which he was president. The deed on its face says, "For and in consideration of the sum of $5,000,000 to them paid in the capital stock of the said company," etc., he conveys by a "quit-claim" deed certain lands that is therein described. The stock of said company is reported to be in value above par.

It appears after this date that other "quit claim" deeds conveying large tracts of these public lands to the said corporation were made, one notably on the 13th day of June, 1889. This conveyed many hundred acres of land, the deed says on its face, for "the consideration of $1." Afterwards deeds were taken directly to the corporation.

It will be observed that before 1884 there were no settlements in that section of the country, except a few cattlemen. Within about three years this syndicate had acquired over $6,000,000 worth of public lands, the country was then opened up for settlement, and the people were rushing in from every direction. Finding the land for many miles around had all been taken in so short a time, inquiries as to the manner in which it had been obtained, rumors and reports were in circulation to the effect that it had been fraudulently obtained. About two years had elapsed since the final proofs had been made to some of the most valuable tracts. In fact nearly two years had expired from the time the fraudulent final proofs were made upon the whole extent of the country. But the act of the 14th of May, 1880, did not limit the right of contest; in fact it invited contest up until patent was issued, and there were stronger reasons for contesting final proof or final entry where it had been made by false testimony than on almost any other grounds, and about this time many contests were commenced against the so-called final proof through which this corporation acquired this vast amount of land. Amongst the most notable cases of contest alleging fraudulent final entry and proof was that of Jones vs. Matkins, Bruce and McLoyd case, in which Paris Gibson, the vice-president of the town-site company figured as contestant, against his own so called title to save the same; James Graham vs. A. C. Campbell, and many others, in all of which this $5,000,000 corporation claims ownership of the land, and were and are the real defendants. If these parties contesting could win their contest many others would have been encouraged, as the law of 1880 did not limit the time in which contests were to be commenced, except before patent issues. Thus you will see the importance of this seventh section that was added to the repealing act of the timber-culture and preëmption law, which was added by the conference committee, and presented to the House of Representatives on the night of the 3d of March, and without its being read or understood was adopted and became a law, and construed by the Department to confirm fraudulent entries.

Five of the six members of that committee have repudiated it. Congress having been imposed upon, not intending to pass a measure, as construed by the Interior Department, taking away the vested rights of the citizens, the least that can be done is to restore the contestants to the standing they had under the law at the time this careless legislation occurred. If you will examine the dates of final entries and proofs and the dates of the contests over part of this $6,000,000 worth of public lands you will undoubtedly come to the conclusion that the dates and the time fixed in said seventh section of the repealing act of March 3, 1891, were all fixed and arranged to meet this Great Falls enterprise.

An effort was made in the last Congress to correct the gross wrong that had innocently, so far as Congress itself is concerned, been imposed upon litigants in the Interior Department by Congress. An effort was made at that time to find out the history of the seventh section that had been inserted in the repealing act of the timber-culture and preëmption laws, on the night of the 3d of March, the last night of the session, 1891. It appears that the two Houses of Congress had disagreed upon the terms or conditions of the repealing act, whereupon the difference of the two Houses was submitted to a conference committee, consisting of:

Senate: Plumb, Walthall, PETTIGREW.

House: HOLMAN, PICKLER, Payson.

This conference committee added section 7 to said repealing act, and made the report at the night session of the 3d of March, 1891, in the closing hours hours of the Fifty-first Congress.

The record shows that said report was agreed to in the House by unanimous consent, without being read to the House, consequently there was no one connected with the Fifty-first Congress that knew the intent and purport of the said seventh section, unless it was one member of said conference committee, until after it had become a law and that Congress had expired.

It is evident that said committee did not intend that the contest cases then pending in the Interior Department should be ended, because they have so expressed themselves, with the exception of one member of that committee.

We had before us satisfactory evidence showing that Senators Plumb and Walthall and Messrs. HOLMAN, PICKLER, and Payson did not intend to add anything to that repealing act that would confirm and cover up fraudulent entries and fraudulently acquired titles to the public lands, where contest was then pending over the same in the Interior Department.

Senator Plumb denounced this seventh section, and the construction given it by the Interior Department on many occasions, which is established by what Senator Plumb stated to Commissioner Stone and Judge Payson, as appears by their letters. Senator Walthall being sick when the matter came up in the Senate wrote Senator BERRY. When the matter was under consideration in the Senate, to strike out of the sundry civil bill, Senator BERRY said: "Mr. President, I thought I could put my hand on a letter written to me a few days ago by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. Walthall] who, I regret to say, is at home sick and unable to be here, in which he stated that as a member of the conference committee he never understood, and, as he was informed, three of the four members of the committee who are now members of Congress, Mr. HOLMAN, Mr. PICKLER, and himself, all agreed that they had never understood for one moment that the effect of the repeal of the timber-culture act would be to cut these parties out of their rights in the cases which were already pending and where they had decisions in their favor.

"The other House put the provision here simply restoring those parties to the rights which they had in regard to contests when the original act passed. It was inserted in the conference committee, I will not say that it was done purposely, but it was done without intending that it should have the effect which the Commissioner of the General Land Office, by his decisions, has given it. It is unjust, it is unfair to deprive these parties, by an act of legislation, of whatever rights they had at the time growing out of the contest which they had made.

"I say, Mr. President, for the Congress of the United States to undertake to legislate to deprive a party of his rights in that way and cut him off is a high-handed outrage, it is robbery; and none the less so because it is done under the form of law. It is unjust; it is unfair."

During the discussion of this question in the Senate a question was asked by the then Senator [Mr. Perkins], as to his belief or opinion in regard to whether Senator Plumb intended to cut off pending contests or not by this seventh section, and he promptly replied that he had no doubt that Senator Plumb intended that should have the effect that the Interior Department was giving it, whereupon the following letter and reply were written and received:

719 EIGHTH STREET, NW.,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 23, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I am informed that you stated to Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN that the late Senator Plumb, who was a member of the committee of conference that inserted section 7 in the act repealing the timber culture and preëmption law on March 3, 1891, told you in your office, while discussing said section 7, that Assistant Secretary Chandler had placed a construction on it not intended by Congress, and that it was not the intention of the conference committee to interfere with contest suits pending in the Department; that it was a travesty upon justice to do so.

Will you kindly let me know if this is correct?

Very respectfully,

C. W. BUTTZ,
Attorney for James Graham.

Hon. WILLIAM H. STONE,
Commissioner General Land Office.

"The foregoing is substantially what the late Senator Plumb said to me in the General Land Office a short time before his death.

"WM. H. STONE, Commissioner."

You will now observe that two of the two Senators who were on that conference committee absolutely repudiated that seventh section as construed by the Interior Department.

As to the House conferees, Judge HOLMAN introduced the measure to correct the great wrong that had been done, and stated on the floor of the House last session of the Fifty-second Congress, to wit:

"I was a member of the committee of conference when that act was passed, but did not suppose that the provision referred to in section 7 could be so construed as to cut off appeals then pending. It has been interpreted, however, to apply to appeals then pending; but of course it should not be so applied."

Mr. PICKLER, another member, reported from the Public Land Committee in the Fifty-second Congress a like measure to correct the construction given by the Department, and denounced the seventh section of the repealing act.

Judge Payson, who was a member of that conference committee, and chairman of the Committee on Public Lands in the House, wrote the following letter on the subject:

"1229 MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE,
"Washington, D. C., February 24, 1893.

"DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry, I was on the conference committee reporting the act of March 3, 1891, repealing the timber-culture act, etc., and remember as well as though it were only yesterday that the conference intended that that act, especially section 7, should preserve all rights that had been acquired under the various public land laws repealed by the proposed legislation. The amendment No. 104, page 65 (sundry civil bill), for act of February 23, 1893, only plainly expresses what I and the other conferees understood, as I believed, was the effect of section 7 of the act.

"We all agreed in our conferences that we would in any repeal save the rights of actual settlers, as well as all acquired rights existing at the date of the passage of the act. Senator Plumb and I spoke of this several times after the adverse holding at the Department.

"Yours truly,

"Hon. C. W. BUTTZ."

Thus you will see that the late Senator Plumb stated to both Judge Payson and Commissioner Stone that he never agreed to or intended to have said seventh section apply to and affect pending contests. And as Messrs. HOLMAN, PICKLER, and Payson, the three members on the part of the House, repudiate it, consequently we are justified in concluding that the other or sixth member is the responsible man. The most remarkable coincidence in this matter is the arrangements of the dates and limitations in said seventh section, so as to cover all the questionable final proofs made for the benefit of this Great Falls corporation.

Another remarkable feature to the arrangement to acquire title to the public lands was the fact that it was not confined to members of any one political party. Yet these able managers (who are supposed to have instigated, if not framed, said seventh section, which was construed by Mr. Carter, of Montana, Commissioner of the General Land Office, and who had been appointed to his office by President Harrison, one of the stockholders of this corporation that had acquired in so short a time some $6,000,000 worth of the public lands located in Montana) have very nicely planned and so far successfully carried out the great enterprise.

The statement made that the proposed amendment will, if it become a law, affect the titles to many thousand acres of land, on which questionable final proof had been made, is not true, as we were informed that at the present time less than ten cases are pending in the Department involving less than 22,000 acres of land; all others have been passed to patent. Over a year ago, to wit, on the 27th day of February, 1893, Hon. William N. Stone, Commissioner of the General Land Office, wrote Hon. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN, then chairman of Committee on Appropriations, that less than twenty-five cases were pending in the Department that would be affected by said amendment. Said letter is printed in the RECORD of March 15, 1894, on page 3004. The views of the present Secretary (Smith) and Commissioner Lamoreux, as printed by the attorneys for the corporation and sent to members of the House, and afterwards put in the RECORD by the member [HARTMAN] from Montana, were considered by the Committee on Public Lands, and thereafter they unanimously agreed (notwithstanding the views of the Interior Department) to report the bill favorably.

Before the reading of the foregoing paragraph was concluded—

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] has expired.

Mr. LATIMER. I ask that the remainder of this extract be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope now that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] will consume his time. I think that is fair.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. This is a matter of great interest; and as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] introduced this amendment, we should be exceedingly glad if he would proceed to give us some information on this subject, about which he is, of course, well informed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve ten minutes of my time for an explanation; but I wish to yield to other gentlemen.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I have no time myself, but would like very much to hear from the able gentleman from Indiana, who is conversant with our land laws.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] does not desire to occupy his time, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HOLMAN. If the gentleman from Minnesota thinks this is proper——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves ten minutes of his time, as the Chair understands.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. As preliminary to my remarks I will ask the Clerk to read a paragraph of this bill, beginning on line 6, page 35.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it understood that the gentleman from North Carolina Mr. HENDERSON] is recognized for an amendment on another subject?

The CHAIRMAN. He is recognized in his own right for fifteen minutes in accordance with the order made by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Are we not going forward to finish the discussion of this amendment, or is it to pass by?

The CHAIRMAN. The consideration of the bill has been completed; and the Committee of the Whole is now proceeding under an order made by unanimous consent yesterday.

The Clerk read as follows:

Punishment for violations of internal-revenue laws——

Mr. REED (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, has there not been some misunderstanding about this matter? The gentleman from Indiana, as I understood, reserved his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. And now are we going to another subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not see that gentlemen can be confined in their remarks to any particular subject.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I should like to know, if it be proper, to what subject we have returned?

The CHAIRMAN. We have returned to no subject.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Then we are doing nothing, I suppose. I trust I have not embarrassed the Chair by this inquiry. I want to find out what is going on—"where we are at;" and we would like to hear what the gentleman from Indiana knows about this proposition. As he introduced the amendment we want to hear from him; and we have, we think, that right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the order under which the Committee of the Whole is now acting.

The Clerk read as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] asks unanimous consent that after the disposal of the matters under consideration thirty minutes be allowed to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY]; twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]; fifteen minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], and fifteen minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] to discuss the matter generally. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. It was my understanding when I asked and obtained unanimous consent for these gentleman to address the committee, that one subject would be exhausted before going to another.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. WILSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist that the gentleman from Minnesota should use his time.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. But we are insisting that the gentleman from Indiana should use some of his time in explaining the amendment which he proposes to put on this appropriation bill. Why is the gentleman afraid to be placed in that position?

Mr. HOLMAN. The proposition has already been explained by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER].

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is the gentleman from Indiana afraid to come forward and advocate his own proposition?

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. I submit that not one word has been said about this amendment. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER] discussed a bill which is before the Public Lands Committee; but he never discussed this amendment at all.

The CHAIRMAN. What amendment?

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. The amendment introduced by the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is mistaken; they are the same measure.

The CHAIRMAN. So the Chair understands.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that in fairness the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] ought now to consume some part of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the committee will rise at five minutes after 2 o'clock. If gentlemen desire to consume the time in this way, of course they can do so. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] has the floor for fifteen minutes.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. As a preliminary to my remarks, I ask the Clerk to read the paragraph in the bill beginning on line 6, page 35.

The Clerk read as follows:

Punishment for violations of internal-revenue laws: For detecting and bringing to trial and punishment persons guilty of violating the internal-revenue laws or conniving at the same, including payments for information and detection of such violations, $50,000; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall make a detailed statement to Congress once in each year as to how he has expended this sum, and also a detailed statement of all miscellaneous expenditures in the Bureau of Internal Revenue for which appropriation is made in this act.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this item has been increased in the present bill to $50,000—just double what it was a year ago. My information is that prior to 1876 the appropriation for this item was $100,000. In 1876 it was $75,000. In 1885 it was reduced to $50,000. In 1887 it was reduced to $25,000. The appropriation for 1892 was for $50,000; for 1893, $25,000; for 1894, $25,000, and now the Committee on Appropriations proposes to increase this item to $50,000. The main reason alleged for this increase is that it has been found that this fund is needed to be expended in North Carolina and a small portion of Virginia so as to obtain information against illicit distillers and others charged with violating the internal-revenue laws in those States.

In my opinion the increase asked for is entirely without excuse. There are no more violations of the internal-revenue laws in North Carolina and Virginia (which State is also mentioned) than in any of the other States of this Union where the internal-revenue laws are enforced. The people of my State are as law-abiding as those of any State in the Union. These internal-revenue laws, Mr. Chairman, have been enforced under every Administration very harshly. We have had a harsh administration of the internal-revenue laws under Republican administrations and also under Democratic Administrations. I believe the law is less harshly administered now than heretofore. There is an inherent vice in the law. There must be more or less severity. But it is not necessary that the Government of the United States should authorize its officers to pay money to obtain information and to hire and suborn witnesses to testify against the citizens of North Carolina or of any other State, whether they be charged with violations of the law or not. There is no more hateful creature than a paid informer. Any law which tolerates or authorizes such a system is infamous. Thomas Jefferson denounced the system in his day as an "infernal" one.

I hold in my hand a volume, printed under the direction of the Committee on Appropriations, containing statements made before that committee by Hon. J. S. Miller, Commissioner of Internal Revenue; Mr. W. W. Colquitt, a revenue agent, and Mr. T. H. Vanderford, a revenue official, both of these last-named gentlemen being now employed in North Carolina. These gentlemen were examined by the Committee on Appropriations in regard to this increase; and what is the reason they give for it? The main reason assigned is that they need this money for the purpose of obtaining information against men who, as they declare, are violating the internal-revenue laws in the State of North Carolina. I include in my remarks the report of the hearing of these gentlemen before the committee:

DECEMBER 18, 1893.

INTERNAL-REVENUE LAWS—VIOLATIONS OF.

STATEMENTS OF HON. J. S. MILLER, COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE, W. W. COLQUITT, AND T. H. VANDERFORD.

The CHAIRMAN (to Mr. Colquitt). What position do you occupy in the Internal-Revenue Bureau?

Mr. COLQUITT. Revenue agent.

The CHAIRMAN. Where do you reside?

Mr. COLQUITT. My headquarters are at Greensboro, N. C.

The CHAIRMAN. On page 63 of this bill there is an estimate of $75,000 for punishment of violations of internal-revenue laws. Will you state to the committee the information you have to give them respecting the necessity for an appropriation of $75,000 for punishing violations of internal-revenue laws, and in doing so state it in your own way?

Mr. COLQUITT. Well, sir, I will state the number of registered distilleries in North Carolina as about 500, and in operation 250. Eight out of ten are what are called 3-bushel houses; that is, they mash 3 bushels of grain a day. They claim to manufacture 2 gallons to each bushel of grain. The price of corn whisky in that State is $1.15 a gallon, and the tax is 90 cents, and that leaves 25 cents for each gallon. The receipts of the distiller then is only $1.50 a day. The cost of corn per bushel in North Carolina averages more than 50 cents, probably 60 cents. This for a 3-bushel house would make $1.50 for the cost of the corn and the cost of a distiller or man to work, that is $1 a day; then for wood, cutting and hauling, about 25 cents a day; repairs, etc., 25 cents a day, making the actual expenses for that distillery $3 a day, and the income from it is only $1.50 a day according to the report.

At the price they sell spirits for they can not operate a distillery of that kind honestly. Spirits are cheaper in North Carolina than anywhere else in the Union. In Illinois, Ohio, Kentucky, and Georgia and elsewhere the yield per bushel is from 3 to 5 gallons. The actual yield in North Carolina is about 3 gallons; but most of them crowd the mashes and work off the tubs every two or three days, instead of every four days, as allowed by law, making the daily yield from 9 to 15 gallons per day, only 6 of which is warehoused and tax paid. The rest is gotten out through collusion with the storekeeper and gauger by the reuse of stamps and using 4½-gallon kegs. The law requires a stamp on everything above that size. The seizures since July 1 have been in this division 35,987 gallons of whisky and brandy——

The CHAIRMAN. In what State?

Mr. COLQUITT. In North Carolina and Southern Virginia. About 5,000 more were shipped into South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida in kegs, and have been seized there and no claimant has appeared for it. The number of registered distilleries seized in that time has been 27. That is for violations where we can catch them absolutely in the wrong. Illicit distilleries seized, 97; horses and mules, 19; tobacco factories, 7. Now, those tobacco factories were seized because they were putting on 40 or 30 pound boxes a 10-pound stamp and thereby swindling the Government. Now, I have here letters showing you how these frauds are perpetrated.

(Here Mr. Colquitt exhibited and read letters to the committee which he stated he did not desire to go in the record.)

Mr. MILLER. I think it would be better not to file these letters, with your permission, for the reason that these parties will not send them in if they know that we give them out to the public, and they have simply been brought along to show the committee and not for publishing. You see, a good many people will send us confidential communications that they do not like to see in the record, although they are considered honest people.

Mr. COLQUITT. I just brought one of each kind, showing you how they perpetrate these frauds. Now here are stamps which they get and put back on the barrels and get them out a second time [exhibiting same]. This was taken from a barrel and carried back and put on another.

Now, here is a complaint from the second district of Tennessee, from the collector. These kegs are just going into there by hundreds.

Mr. MILLER. I would like for you to hear that letter. Mr. SAYERS:

"INTERNAL REVENUE SERVICE,
"SECOND DISTRICT OF TENNESSEE, COLLECTOR'S OFFICE,
"Knoxville, Tenn., October 14, 1893.

"SIR: There is a large amount of illicit whisky shipped into my district from North Carolina. The most of the whisky is shipped direct to the consumers in four and seven-eighths gallon packages.

"I have a great deal of complaint from the distillers, wholesale and retail liquor dealers in my division, from the sale of these goods, as the same is sold for a very low price, and they are unable to compete with the 'moonshiners.' I have had all I could find seized, but it is simply impossible for me to seize but a small per cent of the amount shipped, as they ship it over three different railroads. Now, what I want to know is this: Is there any way to prevent the railroad companies from hauling the goods? If not, can you suggest some means by which this illicit traffic can be stopped? I am anxious to stop this business and to do all I can to help the men who are doing a legitimate business in my district and to at the same time collect all the revenue due the Government. A number of good men in my district who are trying to do a legitimate business claim they will be forced to quit unless something is done.

"I shall await your answer.

"Respectfully,

"J. T. ESSARY, Collector.

"Hon. JOSEPH S. MILLER,
"Commissioner Internal Revenue, Washington, D. C."

Mr. COLQUITT. Here is a letter from a deputy collector who has averaged a still every day for the last thirty days.

Mr. MILLER. You mean he made a seizure of one every day?

Mr. COLQUITT. Oh, he might seize one one day and three the next, and two the next, and so forth, but he has averaged about that, and he says the illicit business has been increasing, and he says they get it out through the use of these stamps, which are returned to them.

Now, I will show you another means they have of getting these stamps. Under the law what is known as a clip is sent back. They get a wholesale liquor dealer or rectifier to send that clip back under cover. The storekeeper and gauger is in collusion with the distiller, and he says it is all right, that that is the proper number of gallons.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, explain to the committee how a person who has three distilleries would operate them.

Mr. COLQUITT. He would do this: He has, say, three small distilleries practically in sight of each other. Storekeepers and gaugers are assigned there, and he will try each one of them and see if he can work his schemes on them.

Mr. MILLER. Try to see if he can corrupt him.

Mr. COLQUITT. If one man is honest and says that he will not do it, and that he has got to give the Government the product of this distillery, he then shuts down that distillery, and the honest man is out of a job; but say the other fellow is practically dishonest, he lets that distillery go on and make from 9 to 15 gallons a day, and give the Government a tax on 6. That is really a premium upon dishonesty in a storekeeper and gauger.

The CHAIRMAN. How long, when one of these distilleries is closed, is it permitted to remain idle?

Mr. COLQUITT. They can start at pleasure. They can operate one day, ten days, two months, or just as they please. They give bond, and as long as they choose to operate that distillery they can do so. For instance, if a storekeeper comes there and wants to close that distillery he can do it in four days—that is, run out the quantity of material they have on hand.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, I want to ask this question: Is this appropriation, for which you ask, to be used entirely for the apprehension of moonshiners?

Mr. MILLER. Not entirely. It is for the detection of frauds in every way, shape, and form.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of the appropriation do you generally use for the detection of fraud upon these licensed distilleries?

Mr. MILLER. It would be a large part of the amount allowed to Mr. Colquitt's district; a great majority of it would be used in connection with the licensed distilleries which are operated in a crooked way, and so you can say two-thirds of it would be used probably in the investigation of matters connected with persons who are operating or supposed to operate in accordance with the law. Would not that be about the proportion, Mr. Colquitt?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, I should think so.

The CHAIRMAN. Did I understand you to say the other day that you had letters from wholesale dealers?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Apprising you that they had received offers of the sale of whisky to them at, say, 90 cents?

Mr. COLQUITT. In the first letter I read the price was $1.15 a gallon and a rebate of 25 cents a gallon for returning the stamp; that was the first letter I read.

Mr. MILLER. We get many of these letters and refer them to Mr. Colquitt or the agent in charge of the district from which the letter comes.

Mr. COLQUITT. Here is a transcript taken from one which has a certain number, which has a record of the packages on deposit, and it shows that these three packages were sold to ——— ———, ———, ———, on October 24. Now, the inspection at Charlotte on October 13, eleven days prior to that time, shows these packages had gone through to ——— ———, ———, ———, the same packages and the stamps returned. Then on October 28, again these same packages go to ——— ———, ———, ———. He has used these barrels three times within two weeks.

The CHAIRMAN. With the same stamps?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Explain to the committee how that is done.

Mr. COLQUITT. Well, sometimes they take the head out of the barrel, returning the barrel with the head inside, and then a cooper takes and turns it again. Then, again, they take the stamps off and send them back, just as those I showed you, and they put them on another barrel, as they have all the brands. Another way they have of doing is to take out the barrel heads and pack them up in a box and send them back by express. I can say, however, the storekeeper and gauger are in collusion where those things occur.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Colquitt keeps now some people at the depot, and in that way they catch up with a great many illegal cases.

Mr. COLQUITT. Now, take this case: Here is a distiller, not a man who owns it, but a man who works there, he says: "You will find two or three barrels of liquor in his barn near the distillery, under the floor. They have not stamps on them. They fill a barrel at the distillery with stamps on it, and the storekeeper allowed him to refill it. He works his beer off every two days and makes two mashes every day instead of one. The storekeeper changes the numbers on the tubs to make them work right. They carry liquor from the cistern room in a 10-gallon keg and put it in the barrels at the barn under the floor." That is one way.

Here is a letter from a man who has been a storekeeper and gauger, who says: "I have been on duty here for several days, and the distiller informed me that he could not run unless I allowed certain things to be done, and I informed him that I had been in the service twenty-five years 'off and on,' and had my first unofficial act to do, and now, taking all things into consideration, I must still adhere to what I knew to be right. So we made our last mash on the 12th instant. He has no fault to find with me, but I told him when we made 3 gallons or more (which we did) to the bushel that I should warehouse it on all occasions. He said he was or would be losing $3 per day, and gave me to understand that a former storekeeper and gauger let up, and unless I did so he would have to suspend. The above is the result, and if the collector or agent has anything for me to do I am in the field."

There is an honest man out of work. Here is one where a storekeeper and gauger goes to a distillery and stays three days in a week and goes home and gives the keys to the distiller. It is from a deputy marshal at Hickory, N. C. He says: "The work I have is a Government still, and is and has been running without a storekeeper; that is, the storekeeper does not stay at the storehouse. Left there Thursday and will no be there until Monday evening. My informant says that he leaves the business with the distiller or partner of the firm, and that the storekeeper is not at the storehouse half the time. I also have a block still, located some 5 or 6 miles from this Government still, which has just commenced work the first of this week. Now, if we could go there Monday morning before the storekeeper gets there, I think we would find him at work without a storekeeper. Could you not send some one to-morrow (Sunday's train)? Let me hear from you."

Here is one from Yadkin County, N. C., in which a man says, "I think it is necessary for you to send some inspecting officer to the distillery in the Yadkin Valley, in the fifth district of North Carolina. They use 9 bushels of grain per day and make from 20 to 25 gallons of whisky per day, feed several hogs and a large amount of cattle and from a 2-bushel capacity. You had better direct them to go to —— and get there about dark, and they will find six mashes any night. The storekeeper and gauger in charge is —— and allowing them to use that much material each day.

Mr. MILLER. Did you get there?

Mr. COLQUITT. No, sir; I have not had time. This is a sample of what is going on, and I did not get here until night before last, and I thought Mr. Vanderford and I would make up a few of these for you.

The CHAIRMAN. From whom do you generally get the information which enables you to seize illicit distilleries?

Mr. COLQUITT. The Government allows us to pay $10 for each distillery reported, and that is paid to the persons reporting them all through the country. Some men come here and report one and then leave the country the next day. Others report dozens.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you get any information from the wives and daughters of the families?

Mr. COLQUITT. Frequently.

The CHAIRMAN. What reason do they give for furnishing you with this information?

Mr. COLQUITT. They say it creates a source of trouble in the community; fighting, etc.

Mr. MILLER. Then have not we cases of this kind where they claim the meal is used for purposes other than the manufacture of corn bread?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. VANDERFORD. A number of them.

Mr. COLQUITT. I will state that I have been in places and I would come to a man's house who would be so poor that I would not find enough in his house to eat, but you can go to his distillery and find from 15 to 25 bushels of mash, and they are reported frequently for that reason. They say it brings all sorts of distress upon them and their families.

The CHAIRMAN. And the wholesale distillers often report to you because of underselling by illicit distillers and by the moonshiners who are competing with them in the market?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir; these complaints do not generally come from the State of North Carolina, but they come from distillers in other States who do a legitimate business.

Mr. MILLER. But who are affected by goods shipped from North Carolina?

Mr. COLQUITT. Yes, sir; the goods shipped from North Carolina are shipped, not being tax-paid, at such a cheap rate that they can not afford to sell the tax-paid goods in competition with them.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the value of the illicit goods seized in North Carolina?

Mr. COLQUITT. I have not the price down. I have just the number of gallons. There were 35,000 gallons since the 1st of July.

Mr. MILLER. And some of that, Mr. Colquitt, was seized upon information furnished from other States.

Mr. COLQUITT. Besides that there is about 5,000 gallons ——

Mr. MILLER. And in addition to that there is about 5,000 that went out from there and was seized in other States.

Mr. COLQUITT. That 5,000 is the estimate based upon the number of kegs and information received from the revenue agent of South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. How much of the 35,000 gallons seized in North Carolina was claimed by men who claimed to be the owners of them?

Mr. COLQUITT. There has only been one large distillery on which a bond was filed, and that was the Bailey distillery.

The CHAIRMAN. How much did that bond cover?

Mr. COLQUITT. His bond covered 10,000 gallons at the one distillery.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you give the amount of that seizure?

Mr. COLQUITT. Mr. Vanderford could do that better than I could.

Mr. VANDERFORD. In making examination of Mr. Bailey's distillery we found that Mr. Bailey was using an entirely different distillery from that set forth in the plan of his distillery. In fact he had no plan. We found that the product of his distillery for one day was 281 gallons, while his storekeeper and gauger had only been reporting an average of 124 gallons. The capacity of his distillery was 62 bushels. He was reporting 60 bushels, or 2 bushels less than his capacity, and was actually making about 281 gallons of spirits each day, and was only reporting 124, or just 80 per cent of his capacity. We found that his warehouse had been changed; the plan of his warehouse was not that originally surveyed, and for that it was ordered to be seized and the seizure was made.

He was working a still—just for convenience, say he was working four tubs; he was working sixteen, but instead of his working sixteen, we will just say four. Now, instead of working one on the first, two on the second, three on the third, and four on the fourth, he was working one and three a day. He was working one and three to-day on the first, and he was working two and four on the second, or working double, and instead of working the amount he says, he was working two tubs when he ought to have been working one. Now, all of that was learned by an examination made at his distillery.

Mr. COLQUITT. I will say in regard to the question as to the amount claimed, that all of this except this one large seizure has been quantities of 5 gallons up to a majority of less than 100 gallons.

The CHAIRMAN. No claim has been set up.

Mr. COLQUITT. None at all. Why, on these registered distilleries we make no report unless it is absolutely such a case as there is no possibility of their getting around. Wherever there is anything that they can fight a case upon even in those courts there, we rarely make a seizure and do not recommend it, and it is not done unless directed by the Commissioner. The reports all come in to him and seizures are never made on these registered distilleries without the sanction of the Department.

Mr. MILLER. How many seizures have you made since the 1st of July of registered distilleries?

Mr. COLQUITT. Twenty-seven and illict distilleries ninety-seven.

The CHAIRMAN. Were these illicit distilleries being conducted by persons who had licenses?

Mr. COLQUITT. No, sir; they are actually moonshine distilleries, run without any bonds at all. These are the kind of fellows you have to watch out for and have a pretty good force or they will run you out. There is a great deal of brandy distilled. You know that that is left almost entirely to what a man reports. Now, he swears to his report and it comes in that way. You will find a report for 15 to 20 gallons of brandy, and if it is investigated you will probably find 125 to 1,000 gallons which the Government gets no tax on at all. These distilleries have not been seized as a rule, because in regard to the brandy distilleries the law is not as close as it is upon grain distilleries.

The CHAIRMAN. Why should any difference be made between the brandy distilleries and the whisky distilleries?

Mr. COLQUITT. Well, sir, I do not see myself, but there is the law, and at the registered brandy distilleries the Government has no agent there at all, and at a grain distillery they have a storekeeper and a gauger, but at the brandy distillery they make their report upon the amount of fruit received, the time worked, and its yield, just as they feel disposed, and swear to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without any inspection upon the part of the Government?

Mr. COLQUITT. Well, the deputy collector goes around, and we get around as much as we can, but there is a vast number of distilleries running and it is impossible to get to them. In fact, in the State of Virginia there are twelve to fourteen hundred brandy distilleries this year—you know there was an enormous fruit crop—and there is probably a thousand in the State of North Carolina; so you see it would be impossible to get to all of them.

The CHAIRMAN. How many grain distilleries are there in Virginia?

Mr. COLQUITT. Well, there are only about, I think, 18 grain distilleries in operation in Southern Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. And how many in North Carolina?

Mr. COLQUITT. Five hundred; 250 of which are in operation. I take 250 from the list and from the last report of the Commissioner, up to, I think, the 1st of November. Here is the list of the registered grain distilleries, and you can see what there are in North Carolina.

Mr. MILLER. There were 1,650 registered distilleries at the close of last year. Out of that number 600 were in North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. Have you anything else to say?

Mr. COLQUITT. No, sir; I believe not.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Miller, have you anything further to say?

Mr. MILLER. Nothing at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Vanderford, have you anything to say?

Mr. VANDERFORD. No, sir; I do not know that I can say anything more.

It seems that there are about 500 registered distilleries in North Carolina, only 250 of which are now in operation. Four-fifths of the whole number mash less than 4 bushels of grain per day and are owned by poor men who are not permitted under the law to reclaim their property in case of a seizure by the revenue officers. No distillery nor distiller's apparatus seized for any violation of law can be released to the claimant, except in case of a distillery having a registered producing capacity of 150 or more proof gallons per day, and not then unless the claimant gives the bond required, and also shows by sufficient affidavits that there are hogs or other live stock, not less than 50 in number, depending for their feed on the products of said distillery, which would suffer injury if the business of such distillery is stopped. (Revised Statutes, section 3331.)

This is a very strange provision of law which favors a rich distiller who owns 50 head of hogs and cattle, but at the same me discriminates against the rich distiller if he is not fortunate enough to own as many as 50 hogs or other cattle. The poor distiller is not recognized at all. No favors are ever shown to him by the internal-revenue law. He is to be stealthily watched and pursued by hired informers, secret agents of the Government, whose names are unknown to him and to the community. What a travesty upon liberty, equality before the law, and justice! These hired spies and secret agents of the Government would not be believed on oath in a court of justice anywhere. When a small distillery is seized, confiscation is the result, no matter whether the accused be guilty or innocent.

The internal-revenue law seems to hold that every man charged with a violation of any of its provisions shall be deemed guilty until he proves his innocence. When whole communities are treated by this system as outlaws and criminals, it is not strange that they should regard themselves as subject to the very meanest sort of tyranny and oppression. Dark-lantern methods will not long be tolerated in this age of freedom and enlightenment. In the vast majority of cases the seizures and arrests made are for technical and trivial violations of the law. There are very few convictions in the courts, but fees and charges are multiplied in every way and the Government is continually mulcted in heavy costs.

Mr. Chairman, I think the Congress of the United States should set its face against any such system of espionage as is disclosed in this evidence. There is no argument to sustain it. There is no reason why the Government should pay informers and hire witnesses to testify against its citizens. These informers are secret hirelings of the Government, whose names can not even be published for the information of Congress. They are going about all through the country in a mysterious way. In the secret service of the Government they may abound in every neighborhood.

This secret service system, as I have said, is in operation mainly in North Carolina and a small portion of Virginia, as Mr. Colquitt says. I am not blaming the revenue officers for discharging their duties under the law. They must obey the orders they receive from headquarters; and I am not blaming the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for doing what he conceives to be his duty in having the law efficiently administered. But I wish to say to him that extraordinary measures and methods for the enforcement of the law are no more needed in North Carolina than in West Virginia, Kentucky, or Texas, or any other State. I do not think they are needed anywhere.

The internal-revenue laws, as I have said, have always been harshly enforced everywhere. There are a great many violations of law in different parts of the country as well as in North Carolina. While on this subject I wish to read an extract from an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Miller, in the case of the United States vs. Ulrici, decided in the eastern district of Missouri in the year 1875, and published in 3 Dillon, 532:

> It is very well understood, both by the courts and by the profession, as well as by everyone interested in the matter, that the collection of the internal-revenue tax in this country has required a system of legislation for its enforcement harsh beyond everything known in our history. And it is equally well understood that, harsh as these measures are, they have been far from successful. Notwithstanding the heavy penalties denounced against crimes which go to defraud the Government of its revenue from internal taxes, and notwithstanding the minuteness and particularity in the description of these crimes, and notwithstanding all the aids which Congress has given by legislation to the enforcement of the revenue laws, they have been very imperfectly executed, and that the Government is cheated out of perhaps one-half of its revenue, especially from the tax on whisky and tobacco.

Judge Miller speaks deliberately, after a careful investigation of the whole subject. The entire system is evil and corrupt. The same motives which actuate men to violate the law in North Carolina will actuate them to violate it in New York and California. Human nature is the same everywhere.

Mr. Chairman, I would not have said a word about this matter if the States of North Carolina and Virginia had not been singled out for condemnation; and these two States have been thus singled out without their Representatives having had an opportunity to go before the committee when this matter was up and when the statements reflecting upon these two States were made. We were not permitted to confront these gentlemen and to hear what they had to say, and if necessary to cross-examine them. Their statements are general in their terms. No names are given and nothing definite is asserted. If the light had been turned on the Committee on Appropriations would have been permitted to hear the other side.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will my friend allow a suggestion?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I wish to suggest whether what the gentleman complains of is not the fault of the system, and whether it would not be better to repeal the internal-revenue laws, thereby affording the remedy.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will say to my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that personally I have always been in favor of repealing the internal-revenue laws. I am not speaking now as a partisan. The Democratic party in the State of North Carolina has always been in favor of repealing the internal-revenue laws and of modifying the harshness of this system.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It seems that the gentleman's party in this Congress are not making very much headway, but are rather increasing instead of repealing the internal-revenue taxes.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I understand that, and I know the cause. The extravagant expenditures of the last Republican Administration necessitated some new sources of revenue. But I have been in this House since the Forty-ninth Congress, and I have been doing my best during all that time either to have repealed or to have modified the internal-revenue system, and vote after vote has been taken upon that subject, and the gentleman's own party has almost unanimously voted against every proposition either to repeal or to modify the internal-revenue laws.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. We are against the proposition which is now made, to increase the internal-revenue taxes, and your side are voting in favor of the increase.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I have not favored the increase. I am not alluding to the income tax, which I heartily favor. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] is a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I do not know whether he favors the increase in the item about which I am speaking, or not, but here are $25,000 additional appropriated, and the statement is made—if not by the Commissioner himself, at least he was before the committee and tacitly assented to it—that this fund is being used in North Carolina and Virginia in order to hire witnesses to testify against citizens there who are doing a legitimate business, but who are charged with violating the internal-revenue laws. I hope the gentleman does not favor such a method of enforcing the law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not object to the laws being enforced. As long as these laws are upon the statute book they ought to be enforced, but they ought to be enforced in a legitimate and proper way. Every citizen should be presumed innocent of wrongdoing until he is proved guilty. That is fair and according to the common law.

No good reason can be given, and I do not believe any gentleman on this floor can justify himself before his constituents for voting for a law which will authorize an internal-revenue officer to pay the money of the Government to one citizen to inform against another citizen.

Mr. SETTLE. If my colleague will allow me to ask him a question right there, is it not from the operation of this very appropriation of $25,000 that the most trivial prosecutions find their way into court, and it is not the exception where, in a case coming in under this provision, a conviction can be secured?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Very likely. I will say this document states what these gentlemen are doing, and how they are using the money, and they say that the money is used for certain purposes. One is to find out whether stamps have been reused or not. It seems that thousands of gallons of spirits in packages, either barrels or kegs, are seized here and there by the internal-revenue officers upon the alleged ground that the stamps have been reused; but the trouble about the system is that these seizures are usually made upon suspicion without any real authority of law, without any proof against the distiller, without any proof against the owner or proprietor of the whisky—I mean such proof as would be sufficient to convict in court. The packages are oftentimes seized hundreds of miles away from where the dealer lives or where the distiller lives.

The whisky is seized and confiscated to the Government. The owners of the spirits are not allowed any opportunity to reclaim their property, and as a general rule a keg is seized here and a barrel yonder, in different parts of the country, sometimes hundreds of miles from the homes of these people, and I say that anybody who reads this evidence can see that these seizures, almost without exception, are made and it would seem intentionally made against poor men who can not afford to go into the courts and litigate the matter. The innocent and guilty are punished alike. The Government is master of the situation in all such cases. In many cases however the Commissioner, when the matter is called to his attention, releases the property seized without cost to the Government.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I will ask the gentleman whether the Commissioner of Internal Revenue contemplates increasing the force under what is known as Form 10?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I do not know.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If there is no increase of the force intended, it must be the intention to increase the pay of those already appointed.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. As I understand it, the object of the increase of the appropriation is for the detection of frauds by paying witnesses to testify against the citizens and to enforce the law generally; and the seizures that are made are for the most part of the property of men who are unable to go into the Federal courts. Mr. Colquitt virtually says so:

Mr. COLQUITT. None at all. Why, on these registered distilleries we make no report unless it is absolutely such a case as there is no possibility of their getting around. Wherever there is anything that they can fight a case upon even in those courts there, we rarely make a seizure and do not recommend it, and it is not done unless directed by the Commissioner. The reports all come in to him, and seizures are never made on these registered distilleries without the sanction of the Department.

But they will go on and seize whisky from a small distiller who is unable to reclaim it under the law. They seize, as it would seem, the barrels of whisky and kegs of whisky of no great value in cases where the owners of such barrels and kegs are unwilling or unable to contest the matter in the courts. In most instances the game would not be worth the candle. I wish to say, however, that the Federal courts in North Carolina administer the law justly and in the most impartial manner. The Government and the citizen are treated by the judges with the same impartiality and justice.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I believe that the distillers in North Carolina are just as honest as the distillers in any other State in this Union, and I believe that the dealers in spirituous liquors are just as honest in the State of North Carolina as elsewhere, and that they pay their taxes just as honestly as the dealers in spirituous liquors in any other State in this Union; the storekeepers and gaugers too, in my opinion, are just as honest in North Carolina as elsewhere; and I say it is an unfair thing that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should come before the committee and single out the States of North Carolina and Virginia for condemnation, as if those were the only States where there were any violations of the law. Why, Mr. Chairman, on that committee we find the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON]. We find the chairman of the committee the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]. Does any one suppose that either of these gentlemen would permit their States to be singled out, as mine has been, as States where large classes of the citizens of those States are deliberately guilty of violating the laws of the United States? I am sure they would protest as I have done.

Mr. SAYERS. Will my friend allow me to ask him one question, since he has referred to me?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. SAYERS. Can you tell me how it is that with the tax at 90 cents a gallon they can sell whisky at $1.15 a gallon?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, I do not know; but you ought to know that it is sold at that price all over the United States.

Mr. SAYERS. I was not aware of the fact.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I suppose not. I say the average price of whisky is just as high in North Carolina as it is in any other State where it is made, in large quantities, and for that matter it is just as good.

Mr. CARUTH. It was sold at 25 cents a gallon before there was any tax.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It was sold at 25 cents a gallon before there was any tax upon it, and if the tax is 90 cents, and if without a tax they could sell it at 25 cents a gallon, they can certainly sell it at $1.15 a gallon now.

Mr. STOCKDALE. You can buy it anywhere for $1.15 a gallon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, my time is exhausted and I have not completed what I wish to say. I would like an extension of time.

Mr. SAYERS. I shall have to object to any extension of time. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall extend his remarks in the RECORD. There is no objection to that.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I ask leave, then, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY] is recognized.

Mr. MCCLEARY. I yield five minutes to my colleague [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, notice was given last week by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] that a separate vote would be demanded on the amendment which the gentleman from Indiana incorporated into the pending appropriation bill, when that bill is reported back to the House.

The discussion of that amendment at this time, as I understand it, is for the purpose of explaining to the committee the legal effect of that amendment upon the rights of citizens, if it should become a law, in order that members may vote more intelligently upon it than they otherwise would be able to do.

I am not personally interested, nor are my constituents interested in the proposition, except so far as it involves the question of unsettling titles generally throughout the United States; but there is a town in the State of Minnesota, situated in the second Congressional district, which adjoins mine, where the property owners are vitally interested, and their rights would be very seriously affected by this amendment if it should pass.

I want to say to members of the committee that prior to the act of May 14, 1880, Congress never recognized the right of any citizen to contest the title conveyed by a final certificate. Prior to that time the Land Department had recognized the right of contest, but with reference to the reëntry of the land the successful contestant stood upon the same footing identically with all other citizens: he had to take his chances with the rest of the world in securing an entry if the original entry was canceled in consequence of his contest.

A great many contests were instituted prior to and were pending in 1880. These contestants had sufficient influence in Congress to secure the passage of an act which gave them the right to be notified by the register or receiver of the local land office if the original entry was canceled; and then, after receiving that notice, they were allowed thirty days in which to enter the land involved in their contest.

The act passed, I say, on May 14, 1880; and I may say that the motive for the act was this: Prior to that time the Land Department did not allow to the successful contestant any prior right of entry, and in order to obtain information of the cancellation of the contested entry it was necessary for them to employ someone in Washington to ascertain when the entry was finally canceled, in order that they might be the first to reach the local land office and make the first entry. That provision, therefore, of the act of 1880 was intended merely to give the contestant the prior opportunity to enter the land without expense. It had no other purpose and accomplished none other, and his rights under this act of 1880 did not accrue until the actual cancellation of the original. In construing the act, the Land Department never held this right to be a vested right until the cancellation of the original entry. When the original entry was canceled, then, and not until then, the right partook of the nature of a vested right.

I say that was the status of the law up to March 3, 1891, when the act was passed which it is now proposed to amend. When the act of 1891 was passed a number of contests were pending on land the title to which had passed to the settler by the final certificate of the Government before the contest was instituted. The effect of that act, it is true, deprived the contestants of this preference right of reëntry, but that was not the only effect. It confirmed in the grantee the title in all cases where entry had been made under the preëmption, homestead, or timber-culture laws, and final proof or payment had been received by the proper officers of the Government. There were several other conditions and requirements necessary to make this act of confirmation effective. So that persons who had acquired title from the Government of the United States in accordance with the provisions of section 7 of this act, and by virtue of the payment of their money in good faith, their final proof and the receipt of the final certificate from the Government had that title confirmed, became entitled to a patent, and acquired a vested right to the property which had thus been conveyed to them by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. TAWNEY. This right, I repeat, Mr. Chairman, was confirmed by the act of March 3, 1891. The effect of this amendment would be to destroy these vested rights, thus created by an act of Congress, and for the sole and only purpose of restoring to a few contesting land sharks the preference right of reëntry which existed at the time the act of 1891 was passed. We have been told that this section 7 of the act of 1891 was not considered by Congress, but was recommended by a committee of conference; and that certain members of that committee did not understand that it would be construed as its language indicated it should be at the time they reported the bill for final passage. However that may be the Congress of the United States is responsible for having created and confirmed vested rights in every case to which section 7 will apply.

Now, the question for this Congress to determine is: Shall we destroy these vested rights, or authorize proceedings by which their destruction may be attempted, for the sole and only purpose of giving to these few contestants a preference right of entry in the event that their contests shall prove successful? I hope that this House will not entertain or vote in favor of a proposition of that kind. Gentlemen may say that if this is a vested right, it can not be destroyed. True. But this act will authorize an attempt, which will involve the possessors of that right in endless and expensive litigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BOEN. Who are the possessors?

Mr. TAWNEY. Those men who have the final certificates from the Government of the United States to their land, their grantees, or the men to whom they have conveyed the land to save borrowed money.

Mr. BOEN. That does not answer my question.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman wants a more specific answer I will say the seven hundred citizens of the town of Jasper, in the State of Minnesota, whose titles to their homes will immediately be involved in a contest.

Mr. BOEN. Is not Jim Hill the owner?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know anything about Jim Hill's interest. He does not constitute the people or all there is of the people of that State who own land acquired from the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, it has been the traditional custom of this country when any change is made in our laws to have a proviso inserted saving the rights of litigants whose cases are then pending. The conference committee having in charge the bill now known as the act of March 3, 1891, changing the method of disposing of public lands, intended to and thought they had placed in that act a saving clause of that kind. It is strange that the gentleman from Montana undertakes to say that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has been imposed upon in this matter. The gentleman from Indiana was upon the committee of conference. He has served here continuously ever since, and this act was thoroughly discussed and passed by this House last winter. The Committee on Public Lands has reported favorably to this House on this amendment for three consecutive winters.

Why does not the gentleman from Montana call on the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], who was also a member of the committee of conference on the act of March 3, 1891, instead of those gentlemen who are serving their first winter here. The probability is that the men who were on that committee of conference, and who were thoroughly conversant with the discussions of that question in the first and second sessions of the Fifty-second Congress, understood this question quite as well as the gentleman from Montana. The gentleman from Montana did very well in disregarding everything except the single case of Campbell against Graham, because it has narrowed down to that. These other gentlemen may argue and may believe that other cases are involved; but the Commissioner of the General Land Office reported to us, when we discussed the subject last winter, that there were only twenty-five cases then pending.

Mr. HARTMAN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I have only five minutes, and I can not say what I desire to say in that time.

Mr. HARTMAN. Does the gentleman say that the Commissioner of the General Land Office reported that there were only twenty-five cases pending?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Yes, sir; he reported that last year.

Mr. HARTMAN. Do you not know this to be the fact, that where any of this land has been platted into town lots and then disposed of to other parties, that there are a great many more than twenty-five cases?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I will come to that. I will come to that question of the platting out of these lands. I will tell you what has been done. Jim Hill, the president of the Great Northern Railway Company, hired a lot of men to squat on the public lands up and down on both sides of the river at the Great Falls of the Missouri.

Mr. HARTMAN. Whom did he hire?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Their names are all in the report. I do not care to have any further interruptions. The names are all given in the testimony taken before the committee. At Great Falls there is a water power equal to the Falls of the Niagara. It is worth millions and millions of dollars. They went there about 1884. For 10 miles up and down the river near the falls they took up the territory, and by these means title was acquired to the land in every case, except this one single quarter that is left, contested by Mr. Graham. These men all had to testify when they "proved up" that they had settled there for their own personal benefit and not as squatters for anybody else.

Can it be reasonably supposed that they simultaneously went there for their own benefit, and not for some other party, and that when they "proved up" they all conveyed their titles instantly and with one accord to this syndicate of Jim Hill's? The result has been that they have turned over their titles to Jim Hill or Paris Gibson, and Gibson in turn conveyed to Hill and Hill has capitalized this land at a capital of $6,000,000 under what is now known by the name of the Great Falls Town Site Company. That is all there is of the "innocent purchasers." It may be that Jim Hill or the Great Falls Town Site Company or the Great Northern, or under whatever name it is now held, has conveyed a town lot here and there; but if so, they have given warranty deeds, and in that event the innocent purchaser can go back on a man who is worth $20,000,000 to defend the title. There is no danger——

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you mean to claim that there are any fraudulent entries?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I can not in the five minutes I have yield to any more questions. I have stated the facts generally as to how the title to this land was acquired. To show to the House what the amendment is I will read it:

Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in its provisions to or affect any case where a contest was pending in the Land Department prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, and any person who initiated contest prior thereto shall have the right, upon cancellation of the prior entry, if by virtue of his contest, to enter the tract involved under any of the land laws of the United States in force prior to the date of this act, if he was on March 3, 1891, legally qualified to make such entry, and as if said act had not been passed.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was to be put upon the law of 1890.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. We propose to put that in the law now. These men are like the rich man in II Samuel, where Nathan told the parable of the rich man with numerous flocks and herds and the poor man who had nothing save one little ewe lamb which he had bought and nourished up, and when a traveler came unto the rich man he spared to take his own flock but took the poor man's lamb and slaughtered it for the guest of the rich man. After acquiring title to all the other land around the falls under forms of law they ask Congress to help them rob this poor man of his one only quarter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I hope the gentleman will have time to conclude the parable.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I refer you to the twelfth chapter of II Samuel.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to have the ear of the committee for a few moments on the amendment. There had been a contest pending for about twelve years between the House and the Senate, in every session, in regard to the repeal of the preemption law and other reforms in our public land system. The timber-culture law was prominently involved, and on Sunday afternoon of the 3d of March, 1891, a conference committee, three Senators and three Representatives, finally came to an agreement, and reported the next morning to the two Houses a bill to accomplish those purposes. This conference report was agreed to by the two Houses and the bill became a law. Of course there was no debate on the merits of the bill as agreed upon by the conference committee. Gentlemen understand how impossible it is to consider any measure on the day a Congress adjourns. So the action of the committee of conference was final. Neither House ever considered the effect of the seventh section of that act of March 3, 1891. The act was passed on the 4th of March, 1891, but all acts passed on the last day of a Congress of course bear date March 3. The effect of the seventh section was considered. That section provides, in substance; that where a certificate had issued and payment had been made, if under the preemption law and there was "no adverse claim pending," originating prior to the entry, the title should be confirmed, in the absence of fraud.

Now, I insist and always have insisted that the effect of that provision was to save existing rights, and so the Land Office under the administration of Governor Stone held. The Secretary of the Interior took a different view. He took the view that those rights of contest were stricken down by this seventh section of the act although it expressly protected the rights of contestants.

Mr. TAWNEY. What rights?

Mr. HOLMAN. The rights of the contestants.

Mr. TAWNEY. What rights did they have?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have but five minutes. The right they had was a vested right of contest, and the right to protect their claim to the land as against the party who claimed to have made an alleged entry. This provision has been read. What are gentlemen discussing? There are two parties to a contest, each claiming the land. One of the ablest committees of this House, the Committee on Public Lands, have twice reported this measure, this amendment now pending, unanimously, as I understand. The bill that they reported is the amendment which I ask the House to incorporate in this bill, and which was done by unanimous consent a few days ago.

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not a fact also that the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office have both reported against your proposition?

Mr. HOLMAN. Oh, certainly. It increases the labor of the offices. But there are two sides to that question. This matter has been pending from as early a time as it could be pending. The act creating this act of injustice was passed on March 3, 1891. As soon as the Fifty-second Congress assembled this question was raised and Judge Payson, one of the ablest of the Representatives who have served in this House in our time, the late Senator Plumb, Senator Walthall, and myself, five of the six members of the conference committee who prepared that act of March 3, 1891, at the close of the Fifty-first Congress, certified that our understanding was that this seventh section did not strike down existing rights or interfere with contests then pending. Congress had never before done that and the only object of this pending provision is to put all these parties back just where they stood at the time of the passage of that act. Governor Stone told us by letter in the last hours of the last Congress that there were then pending only twenty-five cases of contests affected by that seventh section; so that all this talk about ripping up the land system of the country is, of course, absolutely absurd. He says further upon this subject: "The pending amendment (it was exactly the same as the pending proposition—he drew the latter clause of it himself)—the pending amendment is explained by the report herewith made." And then he proceeds to say that it is exactly right, and that he entirely approves it; and let me remind you, gentlemen, that you have very seldom had an abler man in the Land Office than Governor Stone, an able, pure, and upright man.

Now, with this law upon the statute book, which has been construed directly against the understanding of the men who alone knew of the provision and who framed the law, because it was, of course, impossible for Congress on the 4th of March to examine the subject—with that law upon the statute book so construed by Government officials as to destroy the rights of parties then interested in contests who had no intention or purpose to do the dishonest act of striking down these vested rights—will you refuse the proper relief?

Mr. HARTMAN. Does the gentleman call a preference right of entry a vested right?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman has already occupied the floor, I believe.

Mr. HARTMAN. I am simply asking a question now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have but a moment's time. Gentlemen, this is a question simply of common honesty.

Mr. HARTMAN. That is what we say.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question is whether you intend to strike down rights which existed by virtue of law at the time the act of 1891 was passed, for no one denies the right of contesting land entries.

I have never known Congress to violate such a right; no instance can be found in our history, I think, where Congress has deliberately struck down a right which had been clearly established by law, directly affecting a citizen seeking a home on the public land. In our legislation we have always saved the rights existing at the time of the passage of an act. Gentlemen, if there is any mistake about this amendment the Senate or the conference committee will correct it. You are running the risk of doing a great wrong, because every year that this error in legislation is allowed to go on the remedy will become more difficult. The conferees of the two Houses will have an opportunity to consider the proposition in all its details without being embarrassed by outside influence. I ask you, therefore, to let the amendment go to the Senate, and if the Senate strikes it out, then let it go to a conference; but do not, I pray you, do what I think at least a palpable injustice by destroying rights which existed at the time of the passage of the act of the 3d of March, 1891. I do not know any of the parties interested, nor am I speaking with reference to any particular case. I speak only for the general principle of fairness and honesty in legislation involved in the pending amendment.

The amendment is clear and direct, as follows:

That there be added to section 7 of "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891, the following proviso: "Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in its provisions to or affect any case where a contest was pending in the Land Department prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, and any person who initiated contest prior thereto shall have the right, upon cancellation of the prior entry, if by virtue of his contest, to enter the tract involved under any of the land laws of the United States in force prior to the date of this act, if he was on March 3, 1891, legally qualified to make such entry, and as if said act had not been passed."

Who can say that this amendment does injustice to anyone; and who can deny that striking down a right to a homestead which existed on the 3d day of March, 1891, by an act of Congress and without a hearing was not an act of palpable injustice?

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, in the newer portions of the United States, especially west of the Mississippi, we have a large inflow of population. In consequence of this the General Land Office here is far behind with its work. It frequently happens, as a consequence of these two facts acting jointly, that after a man has completed his title to public lands, after he has made his proof and has secured his final certificate from the land office, years will elapse before he can get his patent. In the meantime that land may have become suddenly valuable, by reason of a railroad passing through it and the location of a station, or from some other cause. This is the opportunity for a class of men who are the plague of our Western country, who operate as professional contestants.

They find that this land has suddenly become valuable. They look into the records and see that the patent has not yet issued. They then examine more carefully to see if they can discover any flaw which they can use as the basis of a contest. Then they file their contest, and use that as a means whereby to wring from honest men money by way of blackmail. So flagrant had this practice become that, on the 3d of March, 1891, an act was passed which was in the nature of a statute of repose, an act of confirmation, to settle these questions. The effect of the passage of this amendment would be to cast a cloud over the title of millions of dollars' worth of property, property made valuable by those now in possession, and to whose value the contestant has contributed nothing. He is frequently desirous of reaping where other men have sown. This amendment would disturb actual vested rights for the sake of prospective and contingent rights. As an illustration of what might be done under the old rule, I wish to give in some detail the facts in regard to the village of Jasper, in my own district, as they appear in the case of Ellefson vs. Phillips, involving the Jasper town site in Minnesota.

March 2, 1885, Phillips filed his declaratory statement.
September 12, 1885, final proof made and final certificate issued.
November 14, 1887, he sold to John M. Poorhaugh.

It is to be noted, Mr. Chairman, that Phillips held the land more than two years without any question being raised by the Government or any one respecting his title.

December, 1887, Poorhaugh sold one-half of the land to T. A. Black.
January, 1888, P. F. Poorhaugh purchased a one-fourth interest.
June, 1888, all of these purchasers sold for $7,000 to the Jasper Improvement Company.
This company subdivided the land. The town of Jasper was built upon a portion of it, and from time to time since lots have been sold and the purchasers have built their homes thereon. A great stone quarry is in operation on the land.
April 2, 1889, contest affidavit filed.
August 16, 1889, hearing ordered.
October 9, 1889, hearing had.
December 2, 1889, register and receiver decided that the contestant's charges were not proved and that the entry should stand.
Contestant appealed.
June 3, 1890, Commissioner General Land Office reversed the register and receiver.
Defendants appealed to Secretary of the Interior.
The appeal was pending when the act of March 3, 1891, was passed.
April 6, 1891, the transferees of Phillips filed in the Department an application for confirmation under section 7, act 1891.
February 26, 1892, the Secretary of the Interior held that a prima facie case of right to confirmation was made out and returned the case to the General Land Office for adjudication under the act.
October 15, 1892, Acting Commissioner Stone held that the entry stands confirmed under said act.
Appeal to Secretary filed by contestant, where the case still stands undetermined.

The evidence in this case shows that Ellefson, the contestant, was convicted of land fraunds and committed to the penitentiary for two years in 1884. His two witnesses to the contest affidavit on which hearing was had afterwards made affidavits wherein they swore that on the day they signed such corroborating affidavits Ellefson took them out and made them drunk, in which condition they were induced to sign the affidavits. They further swore that they did not, because of their drunken condition, read the affidavits before signing, and that since that time they had read the same and they contained statements which had not been read to them before signing and which were not true.

The effect of the Holman amendment is to imperil the titles of the numbers of persons who in good faith bought the land in this case and the town-lot owners in favor of the claim or prospective right of the single individual, Ellefson, who brought the contest and who is shown to have based his proceeding on fraudulent conduct towards his own witnesses, and to be a man of at least doubtful character.

It is further to be observed that the contest was not brought until after the land had become very valuable in the hands of the bona fide purchasers who had improved it, though he claimed to have known the fraudulent character of the Phillips entry from 1885 until contest brought in 1889.

Mr. Chairman, it is claimed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that the right to contest is a vested right. I desire to say in that connection that it has been uniformly held by the Land Office—and the reasonableness of it is so obvious that I need not emphasize it—that no preference right accrues to a contestant until after the actual cancellation of the existing entry, and that said cancellation must be in consequence of such contest.

I desire to direct the attention of the committee to two facts which I think ought to be borne in mind in this connection. First, there are two bills pending which will bring this question up on its merits—one on the Senate file and one on the House file. I am at a loss to understand, therefore, why this proposition should be brought in here by way of an amendment to this appropriation bill when bills are pending that will bring the question up on its merits.

Is it because gentlemen fear to have the merits of the question fully and fairly discussed? It looks that way. Now we desire simply that the pending amendment, which is irrelevant to this bill and ought not to have been injected into it, shall be voted down, because then full opportunity will still remain for the discussion of this whole question upon its merits.

For the sake of old Saxon fair play, in order that we may have a full discussion of this question, I beg gentlemen to vote against this amendment. I ask them to do so in the name of 700 innocent persons in the village of Jasper in my district, over whose homes the dark shadow of doubt will be cast if this amendment be adopted.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DOCKERY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 445) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the District of Columbia," approved February 21, 1871, and also an act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874;

A bill (S. 755) granting the right of way to the Albany and Astoria Railroad Company through the Grande Ronde Indian Reservation in the State of Oregon;

A bill (S. 1280) for the promotion of anatomical science and to prevent the desecration of graves in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (S. 1749) to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Monongahela River at Glenwood, Pa.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee again resumed its session, Mr. MADDOX in the chair.

Mr. LOUD. I yield five minutes to my colleague, Mr. BOWERS of California.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, this bill as it is presented to this House is unfair and partial to the last degree. On page 62 it provides an appropriation of over five million dollars for the protection of the farmers of the Mississippi Valley. It reads "for improving the Mississippi River," but it is known that but little, if any, improvement to the navigation of that river other than the removal of snags and the construction of the Eads jetty at the mouth of the river has been made or is indeed possible. Nearly all these millions have been practically expended to protect the farms and plantations of the Mississippi Valley.

It was admitted by nearly all the speakers yesterday that this is what this money is expended for, and always has been. It is termed incidental "protection," but is as intentional as any other appropriation. Now, I do not object to protection for these landowners in the Mississippi Valley—in fact I am a protectionist anyway—but I contend that other farmers not in that valley are as justly entitled to aid from the United States Treasury; and at the proper time I shall move to recommit this bill to the committee, with instructions to report it with an amendment appropriating $10,000 to aid the 1,200 farmers in California in defending their farms, not from floods, but from the assaults of a great corporation.

They have a saying in my country that the longer a man lives the more he finds out, and I am learning some facts here. I observe that it seems always in order to appropriate millions for the defense of Mississippi Valley farmers, but never in order to appropriate a penny for the California farmer. That Congress will fight the very elements, all the forces of nature, and give the millions in the Treasury for the protection of farmers of the Mississippi Valley. But when a corporation attacks the United States patent of the California farmer for his land, then Congress throws up its hands and is helpless.

That it is always in order to increase the amount on an appropriation bill if it is for a rich city like Buffalo; if it is for a rich city like New York, then $90,000 slips into the bill just as easy. If this partial, unfair business is to continue, I want it made so plain people will understand it; so plain that the farmers of California will understand that they have no rights this Congress is bound to respect.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I shall proceed to correct a statement made by a member of the Judiciary Committee respecting the amendment I offered.

Mr. LANE. That is the confession here. Let us see how this matter comes here. The Government many years ago patented these lands to the railroad company; afterward it patented the same lands to these private parties. Now, what does the patent in the latter case amount to? It is an absolute nullity. And when the Government makes a patent to a party it does not give a warranty that it will defend the title of the grantee in the patent.

The gentleman was entirely at fault. These lands were never patented but once, that was to these settlers, never in any manner conveyed to the railroad, nor were these lands within the original grant to the railroad company. And the only shadow of claim the railroad had or has is that by an act of Congress it was given the privilege to select within the limits of a 10-mile strip adjoining the grant sections in lieu of such sections as proved to be mineral lands on the original grant, but they had no more right to select in this strip than any other persons entitled to enter public lands.

In fact, the company did not make selection and get patents—that is not their way. They would have to pay taxes on land if they owned the land. After the settlers have received patents, have made valuable improvements, then the company claims the right of selection, a most preposterous and outrageous claim. That is the situation.

As to these suits, I have explained that the case has not been decided by the Los Angeles court, but the judge did overrule a demurrer entered by the defendants on the first trial, but allowed an amended demurrer to be entered in this case. And a hearing has been had and the judge reserves his decision thus far; so the case has not been decided—is not out of the Los Angeles court yet—but whichever way the case goes it will be appealed. These are the facts. It seems to me that this is a case where the farmers of California are entitled to as fair a measure of relief as the farmers of the Mississippi Valley.

Mr. LOUD (when Mr. BOWERS of California had spoken five minutes) yielded him two and a half minutes more.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota, (at the close of the speech of Mr. BOWERS of California). I yield the remaining three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat surprised the other day, when this amendment was offered, that the only reference to authority was a letter of Governor Stone of the last Administration. I think it must be true that the gentleman from Indiana knew of the existence of the letters from the Interior Department; but, to make sure that those communications had direct reference to the proposition under consideration, I addressed a letter to the Secretary of the Interior, to which I have this moment received his reply. I ask that it be read from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am in receipt of your communication of March 16, 1894, asking me "as promptly as possible" to give my views "of the effect of the Holman amendment on the sundry civil bill to be found on page 3604 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD," present session.

This amendment referred to I find to read as follows:

"That there be added to section 7, 'An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, the following proviso: 'Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in its provisions to or affect any case where a contest was pending in the Land Department prior to the passage of the act of May 3, 1891, and any person who initiated contest prior thereto shall have the right, upon cancellation of the prior entry, if by virtue of his contest, to enter the land involved under any of the land laws of the United States in force prior to the date of this act, if he was on March 3, 1891, legally qualified to make such entry, and as if said act had not been passed.'"

The evident intention of the said amendment is to conserve or effectuate the preference right of contestants under the act of May 14, 1880 (21 Stat., 140), so far as the same is or may be adversely affected by anything contained in the seventh section of the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat., 1095), or by any judicial construction thereof.

As to such a purpose it is submitted whether a law can now be enacted which would or could defeat a confirmation of an entry and a right to patent previously accruing to the entryman by reason of section 7 of the act referred to (supra), as held by the Department in several cases. (See Gerlach vs. Kindler, 12 L. D., 571; Axford vs. Shanks, 13 L. D., 222; Nawrath vs. Lyons et al., 16 L. D., 46; United States vs. Bullen, 16 L. D., 78.)

I am decidedly of the opinion that should the amendment referred to by you, and above quoted, or any similar measure become a law, the effect would be, if it could be made effectual at all, to defeat rights now already confirmed and established under the seventh section of said act of March 3, 1891. In that view I find the aforesaid amendment very objectionable, and would dissent to its enactment as law.

Very respectfully,

S. W. LAMOREUX,
Commissioner.

Hon. GEORGE D. PERKINS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LOUD. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the gentleman from Indiana would make such explanation of his amendment and the reasons therefor as would render it unnecessary for us to ask from the House a yea-and-nay vote upon the proposition. I am inclined to the opinion that had this amendment been adopted in 1891 it might have been of some benefit to the country; but coming at this late day it seems to me that it will have a tendency to prompt men to initiate contests and thus destroy in a measure vested rights to lands which have been sold to bona fide purchasers for a consideration and the title to which has long since passed to the original entryman by reason of the issue of the receiver's certificate, and in many cases the delivery of a patent.

The provision of law complained of is in the act of March 3, 1891, known as "An act to repeal the timber culture law, and for other purposes." It is there provided that—

All entries under the preemption, homestead, desert-land, or timber-culture laws, in which final proof and payment may have been made and certificate issued, and to which there are no adverse claims originating prior to final entry and which have been sold or incumbered prior to the 1st day of March, 1888, and after final entry, to bona fide purchasers or incumbrancers, for a valuable consideration, shall, unless upon an investigation by a Government agent, fraud on the part of the purchaser has been found, be confirmed and patented upon presentation of satisfactory proof to the Land Department of such sale or incumbrance.

Now, the object of this act was well stated by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MCCLEARY]. There had been a large influx of population, and the Land Office at Washington was behind in its patents. Final proof had in many cases been made in the local land offices; and the receivers' certificates had been given to parties who, on account of their necessities, desired to mortgage their property or for any cause wished to sell. It was necessary to furnish some stability of title and to prevent the initiation of contests long after final proof had been made.

As has been stated by my friend from Minnesota, lands which were comparatively valueless had become suddenly valuable. I know of many instances in which men had lived five, six, seven, and in some cases ten years upon a quarter section of land, and when entered at the United States local land office worth absolutely nothing, but by the development of railroad enterprises, the building of towns and cities, such lands became suddenly valuable. Contests were initiated at the land office with the object in some way of blackmailing the owners of land which had been taken up for homes when it was practically valueless. It was to stop this sort of thing that we procured the passage of the act known as the repeal of the timber-culture law, providing that a patent should issue if there had been no valid adverse claim or no contest initiated after two years.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana comes in with this provision, almost three years after the enactment of that law, and proposes to place these men in the same situation with regard to the initiation of contests as they were when the law was enacted, thus destroying the rights confirmed by the act. Now, as the contestant has no rights obtained by initiating the contest, he comes to the land office and makes affidavit that the land has been abandoned or that improvements have not been made. A hearing is set down for a certain day, when the testimony of witnesses is taken. The register and receiver decide the case upon the testimony, and if appeal is taken the case goes to the General Land Office for approval or rejection. Notice is given to all parties in interest, and the one the decision is favorable to comes in and makes entry if he sees proper to do so; but if he does not see proper, the entry being canceled, the land is open to any person who sees proper to apply for it thirty days from date of cancellation by the local land office.

Mr. Chairman, the adoption of this amendment at this time seems to me bad legislation. It will do great damage to many settlers upon the public domain; and if we can not strike out the amendment upon a yea-and-nay vote in the House, it certainly ought to be struck out when the bill reaches the Senate.

There is another matter which, while I am on the floor, I wish to call attention to, although unconnected with this amendment, as I may not have an opportunity to refer to it again. If the chairman of the committee [Mr. SAYERS] will give me his attention I shall be under renewed obligations to him.

Mr. SAYERS. I am listening to the gentleman.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The other day, through the courtesy and kindness of the chairman of the committee, an amendment was adopted relative to the selection of lands granted to the State of Washington for educational purposes. At that time I had not the opportunity of consulting with one or two gentlemen from States similarly situated to mine. Now, I have had my attention called to this matter by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SWEET], the gentleman from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN], and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. COFFEEN]. The effect of that amendment was to give the governor of my State a right to make application to the surveyor-general for the survey of any township, and after such application, such township should be reserved from settlement.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to the gentleman from Washington that I have seen several of the gentlemen interested, and have stated to them that if they would have an amendment put on in the Senate applying the same provision to their States there would be no opposition to it by me.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is it satisfactory to them?

Mr. SAYERS. I suppose so.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Very well. I was only anxious that they should have the benefit of the amendment adopted for facilitating the selection of lands granted the State of Washington. Had I supposed or known they desired to be included in the provision made for my State I would have been glad of an opportunity to have placed those States in the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LESTER). The debate allowed by unanimous consent is now closed.

Mr. SAYERS. I move that the committee rise and report the bill as amended to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LESTER reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes; and had directed him to report the same back with amendments, and with the recommendation that the bill be passed as amended.

Mr. SAYERS. I move the previous question upon the amendments and upon the bill to its final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment?

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask a separate vote on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], relating to the public lands.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I call for a separate vote on the amendments increasing the appropriation for the post-office in New York city and the public building in Buffalo.

The SPEAKER. If no other separate vote is demanded, the vote will be taken on the other amendments in gross, if there be no objection.

There being no objection, the amendments on which a separate vote was not demanded were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the first amendment on which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

After lines 14 and 15, on page 46, insert the following:

"That there be added to section 7 of 'An act to repeal the timber-culture laws, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1891, the following proviso:

"Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in its provisions to or affect any case where a contest was pending in the Land Department prior to the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, and any person who initiated contest prior thereto shall have the right, upon cancellation of the prior entry, if by virtue of his contest, to enter the tract involved under any of the land laws of the United States in force prior to the date of this act, if he was on March 3, 1891, legally qualified to make such entry, and as if said act had not been passed."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment, there were, on a division called for by Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota—ayes 77, noes 61.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 95, nays 123, not voting 134; as follows:

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to vote. I have just arrived in the Hall, and ask it as a personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not submit the request.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. WILSON of West Virginia with Mr. DALZELL.

Mr. CLARKE of Alabama with Mr. WHITE.

Mr. BRATTAN with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. JONES with Mr. GROSVENOR.

For this day:

Mr. CRAIN with Mr. HARMER.

Mr. EDMUNDS with Mr. PAYNE.

Mr. ALDERSON with Mr. FUNK.

Mr. GOLDZIER with Mr. HEINER of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I withdraw the demand which I made for a separate vote.

The SPEAKER. Then the two remaining amendments will be voted upon together.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the engrossment and third reading of the amended bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I desire now to move that the bill be recommitted to the committee with instructions to amend it in accordance with the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS] moves to recommit the bill with the instructions which the Clerk will report.

Mr. SAYERS. I wish to reserve a point of order on that.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after line 21, on page 63 of the bill, the following:
"For aid to those citizens of Tulare, Fresno, and Kern counties, in the State of California, who have been summoned to appear in the United States court at Los Angeles, in the State of California, to show cause why the patents granted them by the United States should not be set aside and annulled, $10,000; the said amount, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, in payment of such counsel as may be employed by said persons in defending the suits now pending in said court."

Mr. SAYERS. I reserved the point of order which I now wish to raise against that amendment. It is that the House can not do indirectly what it can not do directly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. The House can not do indirectly, by means of a motion to recommit, what can not be done directly by amendment. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the contested-election case of O'Neill vs. Joy. I am instructed by the Committee on Elections to call up that case.

Mr. WAUGH. And upon that I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SWEET. If it is in order at this time, I desire to submit to the Chair a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question which has just been called up, the right of a member to his seat, is a question of the highest privilege. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] calls up the contested-election case of O'Neill vs. Joy. The Clerk will report the resolution submitted by the Committee on Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Charles F. Joy was not elected a member of the House of Representatives to the Fifty-third Congress from the Eleventh Congressional district of Missouri, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That John J. O'Neill was elected a Representative to the Fifty-third Congress from the Eleventh Congressional district of Missouri, and that he is entitled to the seat.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] raises the question of consideration against this report.

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Chair indulge me for a moment to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the colleague of Mr. JOY [Mr. BARTHOLDT], the only other Republican Representative from the State of Missouri, came to me this morning and said he was very anxious to be heard upon this case, as he is entirely familiar with it; but that he had just received a telegram announcing the death of a member of his family, and was obliged to go away, and would not be able to return until the last of the week. I therefore ask my friend to postpone consideration of this matter for a few days.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state that the gentleman referred to came to see me this morning and informed me of the fact, but said that he would not leave until this evening. I told him that the case would be called up immediately after the disposition of the sundry civil bill, and that he would have an opportunity to speak this afternoon.

Mr. BURROWS. He was obliged to leave at 3:15 in order to reach home, and I simply ask as a matter of courtesy to the colleague of Mr. JOY, who lives in St. Louis, who is entirely familiar with the case, and who has made great preparations to be heard on it, that the consideration of the case be postponed.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] that I do not wish to inconvenience any member of the House. Could we arrange for some day to consider this case?

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, I am not authorized at all to speak in that regard. I am not on the committee. I have simply presented the request.

Mr. PATTERSON. Then if we can not make any arrangement to fix the time for consideration——

Mr. BURROWS. I simply ask it as a matter of courtesy to the colleague of Mr. JOY, that under the circumstances the matter be postponed. We can occupy the time in the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. PATTERSON. If we could fix a time by agreement for the consideration of the case——

Mr. BURROWS. It is a privileged question, and can be called up at any time; but this gentleman is called home under circumstances which I have stated, and I think it is a matter of courtesy that he should be accommodated.

Mr. PATTERSON. Under the circumstances I feel constrained to insist upon a disposition of the matter.

Mr. BURROWS. Then the question of consideration is raised, of course.

Mr. SPRINGER. Suppose we agree to discuss this case during the remainder of to-day and to-morrow, and permit the gentleman [Mr. BARTHOLDT] to speak one hour on Monday next, before the final vote is taken. Would not that be satisfactory?

Mr. PATTERSON. Would that be satisfactory to my friend from Michigan?

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman may not be here on Monday.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, Tuesday, then?

Mr. BURROWS. I suppose the gentleman would like to hear the discussion.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BURROWS. Probably the gentleman will not read the entire RECORD.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Michigan stated that the gentleman to whom he referred was entirely familiar with the case. If he knows about the case, he will not need to hear the discussion of it in order to familiarize himself with it.

Mr. BURROWS. The only request I am authorized to make is the one I have made. I have no other request to make in regard to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] calls up the resolutions which have been read, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] raises the question of consideration against it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I understand this is undebatable——

Mr. REED. It is.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But I would appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee——

Mr. REED. And more than that, the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio do not go into the RECORD, this not being debatable, you know.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, that is not the proposition. When remarks are ruled to be out of order they do not go into the RECORD; but when a remark is allowed by unanimous consent, it goes into the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I simply wanted to warn you.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. What I wish to do is to appeal to the gentleman having this matter in charge, to let us take up the Military Academy appropriation bill and dispose of it. We can dispose of it this afternoon, and let that work go over to the Senate, as some other work should. There are other appropriation bills that are pressing. It will only take this afternoon to dispose of this.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state that I was instructed by the Committee on Elections to call up this case prior to the taking up of any appropriation bills, but after a conference with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. SAYERS], we agreed to defer action in this matter until the bills already disposed of were disposed of in the House; but now I feel constrained to proceed with the case. However, Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad if by general consent we can fix upon a day for the disposition of this case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to call it up at any time. The question is, Will the House proceed——

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask why it is not possible that we should go on and finish the appropriation bills? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the resolutions reported by the Clerk?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WAUGH. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 117; noes 68.

Mr. WAUGH. Tellers.

The question was taken on ordering tellers, and the Speaker announced that a sufficient number had arisen in support of the demand.

Mr. PATTERSON. I call for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 4, not voting 198; as follows:

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask that my colleague, Mr. GEISSENHAINER, be excused.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and forty-two gentlemen have answered to their names.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That all leaves of absence, except for sickness of the member or in his family, be revoked, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to telegraph all members absent without such leave and request them to return to Washington at once and attend the sessions of the House in order that the public business may be transacted.

Mr. PATTERSON. On that I demand the previous question.

Mr. REED. I raise the point of order upon that. A quorum has been disclosed; and it seems to me that we can not interrupt the proceedings of the House in that way.

The SPEAKER. The House is in a call. A call has been ordered, and no other business is in order until proceedings under the call shall have been dispensed with.

Mr. REED. This is not an order to the Sergeant-at-Arms directing him to bring absent members here. It is not an order to compel their attendance, but it is an order to telegraph them.

The SPEAKER. The rule, as the Chair understands it, has been that while a call of the House is pending any resolution looking to securing the attendance of absent members is in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Any resolution relating to the call is in order.

The SPEAKER. Any resolution to secure the attendance of absent members is in order. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PATTERSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House proceed to consider the resolution called up by the gentleman from Tennessee? Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PATTERSON. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourns to meet on Thursday next.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. PATTERSON, the Speaker declared that the ayes seems to have it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 148, noes 33.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, only 24 members voting therefor.

The motion of Mr. PATTERSON was then agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) adjourned until Thursday, March 22, at 12 o'clock m.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT FOR 1893.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives proposing to print 12,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1893, to report it without amendment, and submit a report thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed 12,000 copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1893, prepared by the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, 3,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate, 6,000 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 copies for the use of the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department.

dent had on the 19th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 62) to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

ESTATE OF CHAUNCEY M. LOCKWOOD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There being no concurrent or other resolutions, the morning business is closed, and the Secretary will call the first bill on the Calendar under Rule VIII, at the point reached when last under consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Before the first bill on the Calendar is taken up, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that the bill (S. 109) for the relief of the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood, which was passed over some days since, be now considered. I will state that I propose to offer an amendment to meet the objection suggested the other day by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR].

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. The bill has already been read.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it had better be read.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Certainly; let it be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. In line 9, after the word "same," I move to strike out the words "upon the basis of justice and equity;" so as to make the bill read:

That the legal representatives of Chauncey M. Lockwood be, and they are hereby, authorized to commence their suit in the Court of Claims of the United States for extra mail service on route numbered 16637, extending from Salt Lake City, Utah, to the Dalles, Oregon, and the Court of Claims shall have jurisdiction to adjudicate the same, and to render a final judgment therein for the value of such extra mail service performed as aforesaid; and from any judgment that may be rendered in said cause either party thereto may appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States; and the bar of the statute of limitations shall not avail in such cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF ROYAL M. HUBBARD.

The bill (S. 343) for the relief of the legal representatives of Royal M. Hubbard was announced as first in order on the Calendar, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to pay to the legal representatives of Royal M. Hubbard, postmaster at Longmont, Colo., for rent of post-office from April 1, 1881, to June 30, 1883, $600.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM M. KEIGHTLEY.

The bill (S. 344) for the relief of William M. Keightley was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to William M. Keightley, postmaster at Durango, Colo., $1,350, being amount of clerk hire paid by him from January 4, 1881, to March 31, 1882, during which period the office was in the fourth class.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HORACE A. W. TABOR.

The bill (S. 345) for the relief of Horace A. W. Tabor was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Horace A. W. Tabor, of Colorado, $3,869.94, or so much thereof as shall appear to the proper accounting officer of the Government to have been paid by Tabor for necessary expenses in the Leadville post-office over and above the allowances made for that purpose.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WORK ON MINING CLAIMS.

The bill (S. 878) to amend section No. 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was reported from the Committee on Mines and Mining with amendments, which will be stated in their order.

The first amendment was, after the word "of" in line 9, to strike out "twelve months" and insert "one year;" and after the words "from the" in line 10 to strike out "time when such work and labor should be completed under the provisions of said section" and insert "1st day of November, 1893;" so as to read:

That the provisions of section numbered 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which require that on each claim located after the 10th day of May, 1872, and until patent has been issued therefor, not less than $1;0 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made during each year, be suspended for the term of one year from the 1st day of November, 1893.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 20, after the word "the," to strike out "tenth" and insert "first," and in the same line, after the word "of," to strike out "June" and insert "November;" so as to read:

And that the further provision that on all claims located prior to the 10th day of May, 1872, $10 worth of labor shall be performed or improvements made by the 10th day of June, 1874, and each year thereafter, for each 100 feet in length along the vein until a patent has been issued therefor, be, and the same hereby is, suspended for the term of twelve months from and after the 1st day of November, 1893.

Mr. STEWART. Let the bill go over. I think we have already passed a bill that substantially answers the purpose. We passed a House bill after this bill was reported, and I think it answers the purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senator certain that a House bill has been passed accomplishing the same object?

Mr. STEWART. Yes; substantially the same object. It has become a law. Let the bill be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. STEWART subsequently said: I ask that the bill (S. 878) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which refers to the working of mines, may be indefinitely postponed, as a House bill on the same subject has been passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, if there be no objection. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

VOLUNTEERS IN INDIAN WAR.

The bill (S. 743) for the relief of the citizens of the States of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington, who served with the United States troops in the war against the Nez Perces and Bannock and Shoshone Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of those killed in such service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. As this is a bill of considerable importance and the Senator having it in charge is not here, I think it had better go over without being displaced.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

SURVEYOR OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. 444) making the surveyor of the District of Columbia a salaried officer, and to provide for more efficient service in the surveyor's office be now considered. The bill was heretofore passed over on the objection of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. TURPIE], which he now withdraws.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has already been read, and the amendments made in Committee of the Whole have been concurred in by the Senate. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. PLATT. If the bill is not too long, I think it had better be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read at length as amended.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the surveyor of the District of Columbia shall receive a salary of $3,000 per annum in lieu of fees, and shall be under the direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the surveyor shall give bond to the United States in the penalty of $20,000, with two sureties, to be approved by the Commissioners, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office, and shall take and subscribe an oath or affirmation before the Commissioners that he will faithfully and impartially discharge the duties of his office, which bond and oath shall be deposited with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, on the recommendation of the surveyor, be, and they are hereby, authorized to appoint one assistant surveyor, at a salary of $1,800 per annum; one draftsman and computer, at a salary of $1,400 per annum; one clerk, at a salary of $1,200 per annum; two rodmen, at $720 each per annum; two chainmen, at $650 each per annum; and such additional employés as may be, in the judgment of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, temporarily required for the surveyor's operations, at an aggregate expense of not exceeding $2,000 in any one year.

SEC. 4. That the surveyor shall, as speedily as possible, execute any order of survey made by any court or private individual of any lot or square within the cities of Washington and Georgetown, or of any land within the District Columbia outside of said cities, and shall make due return of a true plat and certificate thereof.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the surveyor to execute any surveying work for the District of Columbia, without charge, on the order of the Commissioners; and all fees for surveys made by the surveyor or the assistant surveyor shall be paid over to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, under regulations to be prescribed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and be covered into the Treasury of the United States as other revenues of the District are now; and the field notes of the surveyor and his assistant shall be preserved and shall be a part of the public property of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. That the assistant surveyor shall take the same oath his principal is required to take, and may, during the continuance of his office, discharge and perform any of the official duties of his principal, and any default or misfeasance in office by the assistant surveyor, or other assistant or helper of the surveyor, shall be deemed a breach of the official bond of his principal.

SEC. 7. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby empowered and directed to prescribe a schedule of fees to be charged by the surveyor for his services, in lieu of the fees now charged, which schedule shall be printed and conspicuously displayed in the office of the surveyor.

SEC. 8. That all laws and parts of laws in the District of Columbia relating to the surveyor, now in existence, as far as the same are applicable and not in conflict with this act, are hereby continued in full force and effect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND NEAR JEFFERSON BARRACKS, MISSOURI.

The bill (S. 190) for the benefit of sundry persons residing in the vicinity of Jefferson Barracks, Missouri, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to release whatever title the United States may have in that part of the survey within the boundary lines described in the deed of the town of Carondelet to the United States, dated October 25, 1854, and now claimed as a portion of Jefferson Barracks military reservation, situated in the county of St. Louis and State of Missouri, to the legal representatives and assigns of John B. Martigny, to whom the survey was confirmed by act of Congress, approved July 4, 1836; and also to release whatever title the United States may have in so much of the land covered by the patent issued by the United States to William H. Jansen November 1, 1856, as lies within the boundary lines described in the deed of the town of Carondelet to the United States, dated October 25, 1854, and now claimed as a portion of Jefferson Barracks military reservation, to the legal representatives and assigns of William H. Jansen.

Mr. PLATT. I ask that the last section of the bill be again read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the last section of the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 3. That this act shall not affect or impair the title which any person other than the United States may have acquired in any of the lands described herein, adverse to the title of either the aforesaid John B. Martigny or William H. Jansen, or of those claiming under either of them.

Mr. PLATT. That seems to be a provision that the bill shall never take effect.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all. It does not take effect against anybody except the United States. All that is done by the bill is simply to quitclaim the interest of the United States, and if there be any adverse interests under these old claims they can be settled in court.

Mr. PLATT. I think the Secretary made a mistake in the reading of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHRISTOPHER SCHMIDT.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 573) for the relief of Christopher Schmidt.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the bill be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments, in line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$40 a month;" and in line 9, after the date "1892," to insert "in quarterly payments, upon such vouchers as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40 a month to Christopher Schmidt, of St. Paul, Minn., for injuries received from accidental shot on the rifle range at Fort Snelling, July 14, 1892, in quarterly payments, upon such vouchers as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the first amendment provide for the payment of $40 a month during the man's life?

Mr. WASHBURN. During his life. I will state that the bill originally provided for an appropriation of $10,000. The man is totally disabled.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN. I move to amend by adding at the end of the bill, "payment to commence from the time of receiving such injuries."

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. I think we are doing very liberally if we do what the bill now provides. Congress never has granted arrears, and the amendment proposes practically to pay arrears.

Mr. WASHBURN. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that this person is totally and absolutely disabled from the wound he received, and there seems to me no good reason why the payment should not commence from the time of the injury as much as from the present time.

Mr. COCKRELL. The committee did not consider that question. If that question is to be raised it will open the door to granting arrears by special act of Congress, and I shall have to insist on the bill being recommitted.

Mr. WASHBURN. I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDENT protempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have the clause read which fixes the duration of this pension at $40 a month. Is it to be during the life of the person?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the part of the bill referred to by the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $40 a month to Caristopher Schmidt, of St. Paul, Minn., for injuries received from accidental shot on the rifle range at Fort Snelling.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be $40 a month during his life. We do not want to establish a perpetual annuity here.

Mr. COCKRELL. I supposed that was in the bill. That was the intention of the committee. I move to insert the words "for and during the term of his natural life." Those words ought to have been in the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, after the "month," it is proposed to insert "for and during the term of his natural life."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARY O. AUGUSTA.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4013) to release and turn over to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia. It is a bill which has passed the House of Representatives and was unanimously reported favorably by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PASCO. I hope cases on the Calendar will be allowed to be taken up in their turn. Was this case passed over heretofore?

Mr. HUNTON. I will say to the Senator that the bill will only require a moment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the regular order. We shall reach the bill referred to by the Senator from Virginia in a few moments, and I must object to taking it up out of its order.

Mr. HUNTON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next bill on the Calendar will be stated.

NATIONAL CEMETERY NEAR PENSACOLA, FLA.

The bill (S. 407) making an appropriation for the improvement of the road to the national cemetery near Pensacola, Fla., was announced as next in order, and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to appropriate $10,000 for the purpose of shelling or otherwise improving the roadway from Pensacola, Fla., to the national cemetery near that city, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SENATE PRIVILEGES AND ELECTIONS.

The concurrent resolution to print 4,000 copies of the new edition of the Senate election cases was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate and will be read at length.

The Secretary read the resolution reported by Mr. GORMAN from the Committee on Printing, December 14, 1893, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 4,000 copies, in cloth, of the first volume of the new edition of the Senate election cases; 1,500 copies to be for the use of the members of the Senate and 2,500 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, the same to be printed on the back as follows:

Senate Privileges and Elections.
Volume I.
Election Cases.
Taft.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments heretofore submitted by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "cloth," in line 3, it is proposed to insert "in volume 1" and to strike out the words "of the first volume of."

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not want that amendment agreed to in that way.

Mr. HOAR. I think it will be well, before adopting the verbal amendments, as they are all substantially one, to let the Secretary read the concurrent resolution as it will read after the amendments have all been adopted.

Mr. COCKRELL. The amendment was read to insert "in volume 1," instead of "in one volume."

Mr. HOAR. I think we should understand the resolution better if the Secretary will read it as it will read if all the proposed amendments are agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the resolution as it will read if the amendments are agreed to.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 4,000 copies, in cloth, in one volume, of the new edition of the Senate election cases, and of precedents relating to the privileges of the Senate: 1,500 copies to be for the use of the members of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, the same to be printed on the back as follows:

Senate Privileges and Elections.
Election Cases.
Taft.
Precedents
as to Privileges.
Furber.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. From what committee does the resolution come?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. From the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I desire to inquire whether this proposed publication includes a history of the three cases recently disposed of from Washington, Wyoming, and Montana? I refer to the three cases of temporary appointment by the governors of those States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator reporting the resolution is not now in his seat.

Mr. HOAR. I suppose it would not be convenient to insert those cases as part of the text of the volume without sending it back for the preparation of a new index. The volume is stereotyped, and was in accord with the index some time ago. The volume was prepared before the cases referred to by the Senator from Oregon were decided. This resolution is merely to print an additional number of copies; but I think it might be well to add to the concurrent resolution a section requiring the printing of the cases referred to as an appendix, so that they may be in the new edition.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I think that would be quite satisfactory, and I think it should be done.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; I think that should be done.

Mr. COCKRELL. Those cases ought to be included in the volume, and I shall oppose the resolution unless they are included.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. So shall I.

Mr. COCKRELL. The edition should be brought up to date. I wish to call attention to the way in which the Secretary read the resolution, which I do not understand corresponds with the amendments which have been proposed. It should read "Senate Privileges and Elections in one volume." The way it was read it would be "in volume 1," which would indicate that there is to be a subsequent volume to come out.

Mr. HOAR. The original publication, which I think was prepared very carefully, is very well done indeed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts will allow the Chair to state to the Senator from Missouri that the resolution reads "in one volume," not "in volume 1."

Mr. COCKRELL. It was not so read the last time by the clerks, for I closely observed the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood it to be read the last time, and the clerks now inform the Chair that it reads "in one volume," and not "in volume 1."

Mr. HOAR. This originally was a compilation containing solely contested-election cases, and was published eight or ten years ago. Then a new edition was prepared, and there was a new volume added containing the precedents and other historical matter relating to the privileges of the Senate. The resolution as reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections proposed to have two volumes, one to be entitled "Contested-Election Cases," and the other "Privileges," but the Committee on Printing thought it would be better to have but one volume instead of two. So they propose this amendment. That is the history of it. That is the way the phrase got in.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if the proposed publication includes all the contested-election cases up to date?

Mr. HOAR. This is not a proposed publication in the ordinary sense in which those words are used. It is a document which was completed and reported to the Senate at the beginning of the extra session of Congress last summer, and then printed with indices, and so on. This is merely a resolve for additional copies. The volume was then printed and stereotyped, I understand. Now, the Committee on Printing propose to have certain additional copies printed. You can not incorporate in this volume in the ordinary way the cases in regard to appointment by the governors, which were disposed of during the extra session in the spring, without repaging and reprinting the volume, putting them in in their proper places under the matter of the appointment by governors, and making a new index. All the matter would have to be gone over again, and it would not correspond with the other copies which have been printed and distributed. So when the Senator from Oregon suggested including those cases I suggested that they had better be put in an appendix. Then, when a new edition comes hereafter, if there is one, they can be put in the body of the work. The Senator from Oregon agreed that that would be all that could be done.

Mr. GEORGE. In a supplement or appendix. That will do. But I think it ought to be in one or the other.

Mr. HOAR. I think so, too. I think the resolution should be amended so as to read that there shall be added to said volume as an appendix all cases decided by the Senate up to date.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts this amendment, to come in at the proper place:

Provided further, That the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections—

If that is the proper person—shall, under the direction of such committee, prepare a full statement of the proceedings in committee and Senate of all election cases up to date——

Mr. HOAR. All cases since?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Yes; all election cases determined since the preparation of that volume—and that the same shall be printed in this volume as an appendix thereto.

Mr. HOAR. Very well; that will do. Of course, the Senator will understand that that will delay the circulation of the volume for six months or some such time, but I presume there will be no great harm done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The several amendments that have been offered have not yet been acted upon. The Secretary will state the first amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the word "cloth," in line 3, insert the words "in one volume."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, before the word "new," strike out "of the first volume of."

Mr. COCKRELL. The word "of" at the end of the phrase proposed to be stricken out should remain.

The SECRETARY. Strike out the words "of the first volume."

Mr. COCKRELL. That will do. Do not strike out the word "of;" if you do, you make it imperfect.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the word "cases," in line 4, insert:

And of precedents relating to the privileges of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, strike out the words, "Volume I."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the name "Taft," in line 11, insert:

Precedents
as to Privileges.
Furber.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I move to add at the end of the resolution the following proviso:

Provided further, That the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall, under the direction of such committee, prepare a full statement of the proceedings in committee and Senate of all election cases since determined, and the same shall be published as an appendix to the foregoing publication.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon if it is his purpose to have the clerk proceed in regard to those cases on a different theory from that in which the volume is made up in regard to the others? The theory on which the volume is made up is to have the clerk make a statement of the case, putting in such specially important matter of the discussions and proceedings as he sees fit, and to refer to the pages of the RECORD where the rest is contained. I suppose the speeches on these cases, the full statement which the Senator provides for, would make a volume larger than the other two together.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I have no intention to have all the speeches embodied.

Mr. HOAR. I did not suppose so. The Senator is a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and it is to be done under their direction. I doubt if the clerk would fail to put in anything that any member of the committee might deem of enough importance to be added. Why not add "a report of the cases which have taken place since," and let the committee or the clerk under their direction determine what shall be done.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Then let it read:

The clerk * * * shall, under the direction of such committee, prepare a full statement.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest to strike out the word "statement" and insert "prepare a report of the cases."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well; I have no objection to that modification. "Prepare a report of the proceedings in committee and Senate."

Mr. HOAR. I would simply say "report of the cases."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I suggest, "Report of the cases and proceedings in committee and Senate."

Mr. HOAR. Why does the Senator say "in committee and Senate?" Why not say "report of the cases?" The clerk would undoubtedly carry out the scheme.

Mr MITCHELL of Oregon. Then let it read, "Report of the cases since determined, the same to be published as an appendix to the foregoing publication."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Oregon that there is no proviso to the concurrent resolution. Therefore he had better strike out the word "further," after the word "Provided."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That the clerk of the Committee on Privileges and Elections shall, under the direction of such committee, prepare a report of the cases since determined, and the same shall be published as an appendix to the foregoing publication.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. In the amendment just agreed to, I suggest that the last clause read "and the same shall be inserted as an appendix in the foregoing publication," so as to make it clear that it is to be in the same volume.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The words will be inserted as suggested if there be no objection. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution as amended.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

SEALER OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

The bill (H. R. 3246) for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] would like to have the bill go over for the present. In his absence I ask that it may go over, retaining its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Being objected to, the bill goes over, holding its place on the Calendar.

MRS. MARY O. AUGUSTA.

The bill (H. R. 4013) to release and turn over to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALLEYS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The bill (S. 971) to open, widen, and extend alleys in the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia, with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the act of Congress approved July 22, 1892, entitled "An act to provide for the opening of alleys in the District of Columbia," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to authorize the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, under the terms and conditions of said act in regard to the opening, extending, widening, or straightening of alleys, to open minor streets in said District of a width not less than 40 feet nor more than 60 feet, to run through a square from one street to another, whenever in the judgment of said Commissioners the public interests require it.

SEC. 2. That the words, "one copy of which (plat) shall be filed with the recorder of deeds and the other in the office of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia," in section 3 of said act, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read, "one copy of said plat shall be filed and recorded in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, one in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, and one in the office of the Commissioners of said District."

SEC. 3. That the words "six dollars for the services of said marshal," in section 5 of said act, be, and the same are hereby, amended so as to read, "five dollars per diem for the services of said marshal when actually employed."

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to know what will be the effect of the bill. As I understand the amendment, it does not authorize the Commissioners to open all the alleys in the city, but only those that are known as street alleys. I suppose those are the narrower places, where houses have been built. I understand there are a large number of alleys where the houses are built right up to the very edge of the alley, and there is no space except the existing space. If those alleys are to be widened are all the buildings to be torn down, and if so, at whose expense? Are there to be condemnation proceedings, and are the taxpayers of the District of Columbia and of the United States to be made to tear down all the fronts of those buildings? I should like to have some information on that question.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The Senator who reported the bill is present.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not expect the bill to come up this morning, and I ask that it may go over, keeping its place on the Calendar, in order that I may answer the questions of the Senator from Missouri. I am satisfied the amendment does not affect the question raised by him. It relates rather to the width and the recordation of plats than anything else. The former law to which this is an amendment makes all the provisions to which the Senator refers. However, I ask that the bill go over, so that I can examine the law on the subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over and holds its place on the Calendar.

FORT JUPITER MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CALL. The bill (S. 653) to open certain parts of the Fort Jupiter military reservation, in the State of Florida, to entry under the homestead law, was passed over, retaining its place on the Calendar. I see my colleague in the Chamber, and I ask that the bill be taken up and disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was the bill passed over without prejudice?

Mr. CALL. It was passed over without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has heretofore been read as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CALL. There is an amendment pending to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment heretofore proposed by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

The SECRETARY. In line 4, after the word "Florida," strike out "not heretofore patented by the United States under existing laws;" in line 10, after the word "east," strike out "and also excepting the portions thereof which have been claimed by the State of Florida as swamp lands, but which have not been patented, provided that upon examination it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Land Department that the same are of the character alleged;" and in line 16, after the word "laws," strike out "and not otherwise;" so as to make the first section of the bill read:

That all the lands within the Fort Jupiter military reservation, in the State of Florida, excepting lot 1 of section 31, in township 40 south, of range 43 east, now reserved for light-house purposes, and excepting the portions thereof reserved by an order of the President for life-saving purposes, described as lots 4 and 5 of section 5, in township 41 south, of range 42 east, are hereby made subject to entry under the homestead laws.

Mr. DOLPH. If the amendment is insisted on the bill can not be disposed of to-day. I therefore object to its present consideration.

Mr. CALL. I shall insist on the amendment, but I do not understand this to be a call of unobjected cases on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill stands on the Calendar under Rule VIII, subject to all the conditions of every other bill on the Calendar under that rule. It will be passed over without prejudice.

Mr. CALL. I should be very glad to have the bill considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon object?

Mr. DOLPH. I do. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida can not be acted upon without a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon desire to have the bill go over under Rule IX.

Mr. DOLPH. I am willing that it shall go over under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice, holding its place on the Calendar.

Mr. PASCO. I should like to say one word. I wish very much that the Senator from Oregon would withdraw his objection. Of course if there is to be a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment it may be possible there is not a voting quorum present, but I should like very much to have the matter disposed of and the bill passed. The amendment to the bill offered by my colleague can not be consented to by the Committee on Public Lands for the reasons I stated the other day and that were stated by the Senator from Oregon. I do not think it would be advantageous to the settlers. I appeal to my colleague to allow the bill to be passed in the shape in which it came from the committee. It seems to be satisfactory to the actual settlers there, and I should like very much to have it passed by the Senate.

Mr CALL. I regret very much that I can not yield to my colleague's request. I regard this as a bill to deprive every homestead settler of his right to the land, and I think I can demonstrate that fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, being objected to, goes over, holding its place on the Calendar.

LOUIS L. WILLIAMS.

The bill (H. R. 913) for the relief of Louis L. Williams was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Louis L. Williams $395.70, due him as salary and for expenses incurred in the discharge of his duties as World s Fair commissioner from Alaska.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BEAUFORT LIBRARY SOCIETY.

The joint resolution (S. R. 12) for the restoration of the books of the Beaufort Library Society, of Beaufort, S. C., was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate and transfer, out of the duplicate volumes belonging to the Library of Congress, an equivalent in books, both in number and value, to replace the loss of the library of the Beaufort Library Society, of Beaufort, S. C., which was taken by the orders of an officer of the United States in 1862, and subsequently destroyed by fire. The Joint Committee on the Library of Congress is authorized and required to select and convey the books herein provided for upon a list to be furnished by the Librarian of Congress.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EQUESTRIAN STATUE OF GENERAL FRANCIS MARION.

The bill (S. 266) providing for the erection of an equestrian statue of Gen. Francis Marion was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on the Library with an amendment, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $40,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the erection of an equestrian statue of Gen. Francis Marion, within the limits of the city of Columbia, S. C., and for the proper preparation, grading, and inclosing of the lot and foundation upon which said statue shall be erected, which sum shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, or such officer as he may designate: Provided, That the money hereby appropriated shall be drawn from time to time only as may be required during the progress of the work, and upon the requisition of the Secretary of War: And provided further, That no part of the money hereby appropriated shall be so expended until a suitable lot of land in said city of Columbia, for the erection of said statue, shall be conveyed, with all the right, title, and interest therein of the owner thereof, to the United States, and the deed duly recorded, and the city of Columbia shall have provided for public use an open highway or other satisfactory means of access thereto.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in force from its passage,

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I move to strike out section 2, the provision that the proposed act shall be in force from and after its passage. It is wholly unnecessary. By the Constitution an act goes into effect from and after its passage, without any provision on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). Is there ob ection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BUTLER. No objection.

Th PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and section 2 of the bill is stricken out.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DWIGHT HALL.

The bill (S. 574) for the relief of Dwight Hall was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, in line 17, after the word "them," to insert "not to exceed the sum of $157.50;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the claim made against the United States by Dwight Hall, of Wallingford, Conn., for the amount paid by him to the collector of internal revenue for the second district of Connecticut as taxes and penalties upon 30,000 cigars manufactured by him and previous to the payment of said tax or penalty claimed to have been destroyed by an accidental fire, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the said Dwight Hall, or his personal representatives, or the person or persons who may be lawfully entitled thereto, any sum of money found on such investigation to be equitably due on account of payment of said tax and penalty, or either of them, not to exceed the sum of $157.50, and the said sum when paid to be in full satisfaction and discharge of all claim as tax or penalty on said cigars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 6, after the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred," and at the end of the bill to insert "said amount to be received by the said Potomac Steamboat Company in full satisfaction of all claims and demands against the United States in consequence of the said collision;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Potomac Steamboat Company the sum of $5,090, that being the amount paid by the said Potomac Steamboat Company under a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, to the Baker Salvage Company for services rendered to the steamer Excelsior, belonging to the said Potomac Steamboat Company, when she was sunk by the United States steam tug Fortune in Hampton Roads, Virginia, on the 4th day of December, 1882, said amount to be received by the said Potomac Steamboat Company in full satisfaction of all claims and demands against the United States in consequence of the said collision.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that the joint resolution may go over temporarily, retaining its place on the Calendar, as I am awaiting a communication from the Attorney-General on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over without prejudice.

PORTRAIT OF CAPT. SAMUEL CHESTER REID.

The bill (S. 1349) authorizing the purchase of a portrait of Capt. Samuel Chester Reid was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $2,500 for the purchase from the owner of the portrait painting by John Wesley Jervis of Capt. Samuel Chester Reid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAYMENT FOR INDIAN SUPPLIES.

The bill (S. 1055) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in the cases of Edward N. Fish and others for supplies furnished the Indian service, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the first part of the report be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The report will be read at the request of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PLATT. Does the Senator from Missouri prefer that the report should be read, or that I should make a statement?

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to have the first part of the report go in the RECORD.

Mr. PLATT. All right.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. PLATT January 4, 1894, as follows:

The Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1055) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in the cases of Edward N. Fish and others for supplies furnished the Indian service, submit the following report:

The four claims embraced in this bill are for flour, beef, and other supplies furnished the Indian service in Arizona in the years 1873 and 1874. The facts relating to each case are set forth in the findings of fact of the Court of Claims annexed hereto.

In all the cases vouchers were furnished for the full amount claimed at the time when the property was furnished. These vouchers were presented to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but on account of a deficiency in the appropriations, were not at that time paid.

In two of these cases partial payments on account were made in 1876 and 1877, the balance being suspended for want of further appropriation.

A large number of similar claims having accrued in the Indian service, a general act of Congress was passed on August 7, 1882 (22 Stat. L., 235), authorizing their adjudication. The claims embraced in this bill were allowed in full under this law by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and by the Second Auditor of the Treasury. The Second Comptroller of the Treasury cut down the amount in each claim on the ground that the supplies furnished were not worth the amount charged. It was not alleged that the prices charged were in excess of the contract prices. Upon reconsideration the Second Comptroller allowed an additional amount in each case, less than the full claim.

It is seen by the above statement that the full amount due in these cases had been conceded by the officers who gave the vouchers and by the Indian Bureau when the claims accrued; that after the act of 1882 the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Auditor concurred in approving the claims in full, and that it was not until after they reached the Comptroller that any deduction was made. The claimants then appealed to Congress for relief, and the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, on July 22, 1886, referred the claims to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts in accordance with the act of March 3, 1883 (22 Stat. L., 485).

The claimants then took new testimony upon depositions, subject to cross-examination, to show that the property furnished the Indian service in Arizona was worth the full sum claimed. The Court of Claims finds that in each case the property was worth the full amount claimed, and that there was an agreement between the officers of the Indian Bureau and the claimants to pay these amounts.

Reports have been received from various departments in relation to the cases, and it appears clear to the committee that the findings of the Court of Claims, upon a fair trial of the cases, are correct and ought to stand as final, and that the claimants should be paid the amounts claimed by them respectively as set forth in the accompanying bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRICT CORPORATIONS.

The bill (S. 1305) to amend "An act relating to the incorporation of certain corporations within the District of Columbia," approved October 1, 1890, was announced as next in order on the Calendar.

Mr. MARTIN. There is some controversy about certain provisions in the bill, and I ask that it be passed over for the present and retain its place on the Calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice, at the request of the Senator from Kansas.

ADMINISTRATORS OF M. C. MORDECAI.

The bill (S. 269) for the relief of Jacob I. Cohen and J. Randolph Mordecai, administrators of M. C. Mordecai, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Jacob I. Cohen and J. Randolph Mordecai, administrators of M. C. Mordecai, $6,400, in full compensation for the postage on mails transported by Mordecai in the steamer Isabel, or any other steamer, from Charleston, S. C., to Havana, Cuba, by way of Savannah, Ga., and Key West, Fla., from the 1st of October, 1859, to the 20th of July, 1860.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CERTIFICATES OF TITLE TO VESSELS.

The bill (S. 507) providing for the collection of fees for furnishing certificates of title to vessels was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that collectors of customs shall collect and receive $1 for each certificate provided for in section 4194 of the Revised Statutes of the United States from persons or corporations requiring the same, and repeals section 1 of the act of June 19, 1886, entitled "An act abolishing certain fees for official services," so far as it authorizes the payment by the United States of any fee for furnishing such certificate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOARDING OF VESSELS BEFORE MOORING.

The bill (S. 587) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers by sea," approved August 2, 1882, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to amend the act of August 2, 1882, by the insertion of the following words in section 9, after the first sentence thereof:

And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the master of any steamship or other vessel, not carrying immigrant passengers, and not in distress, after the arrival of the vessel within any collection district of the United States, to allow any person or persons, except a pilot, officer of the customs, or health officer, agents of the vessel, and consuls, to come on board of the vessel until she has been taken in charge by an officer of the customs, nor without his permission after charge so taken and before the vessel has arrived at her destination and been completely moored.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATIONS FOR UNITED STATES CANALS.

The bill (S. 511) providing for the establishment and enforcement of rules and regulations for the use and navigation of United States canals and similar works of navigation, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARKING OF VESSELS.

The bill (S. 509) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 4178, Revised Statutes, in relation to the marking of vessels' names at bow and stern, and also to provide for marking the draft," approved February 21, 1891, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGISTRY AND LICENSE OF VESSELS.

The bill (S. 588) to repeal section 4145 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and to amend sections 4146 and 4320, also section 1 of the act amending section 4214 of the Revised Statutes, approved March 3, 1883, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF INSPECTORS OF STEAMSHIPS.

The bill (S. 497) to amend "An act to amend section 4400 of Title LII, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the regulation of steam vessels," approved August 7, 1882; and also to amend section 4414, Title LII, of the Revised Statutes, "Regulations of steam vessels," was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments, in section 2, line 54, after the word "each," to strike out "for the district of New Orleans, La.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Baltimore, Md.; Boston, Mass., and San Francisco, Cal., at $1,800 per year each;" and in line 59, after the word "each," to insert: "Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, increase the salaries of assistant inspectors to not exceed $1,800 per annum in districts where the number of steamers inspected shall exceed three hundred and twenty-five per annum," so as to read:

The Supervising Inspector-General shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury, at the end of each fiscal year, the number of steamers inspected in each local district in that year, which number shall be the basis upon which shall be determined the salaries to be paid to local inspectors for the following fiscal year, in the ratio described in the preceding paragraphs of this section. And, in addition, the Secretary of the Treasury may appoint, upon the nomination of the supervising inspector of the district, in collection districts where there are 225 steamers and upward to be inspected annually, assistant inspectors, at a salary, for the district of New York, of $2,000 a year each; and for all other districts at a salary not exceeding $1,600 a year each: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, increase the salaries of assistant inspectors to not exceed $1,800 per annum in districts where the number of steamers inspected shall exceed 325 per annum, and he may appoint a clerk to any such board at a compensation not exceeding $1,200 a year to each person so appointed. Every inspector provided for in this or the preceding sections of this title shall be paid for his actual and reasonable traveling expenses at the rate of 8 cents per mile, incurred in the performance of his duty, together with his actual and reasonable expenses for transportation of instruments, which shall be certified and sworn to under such instructions as shall be given by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I understand from the reading of the bill that it reduces the present salary allowed to inspectors in the district of Florida. I ask the Senator from Maine if that is the case?

Mr. FRYE. My impression is that it does not do so in the district of Florida. It decreases the salaries in places where the inspection of steamships has been reduced by reason of the disappearance of steamships. It adjusts the salaries of inspectors according to the amount of work done, which is the only fair way.

Mr. CALL. I should like to have the bill maturely considered in that respect.

Mr. FRYE. The bill has been considered in the Senate at two former sessions of the Senate and passed. It has been passed twice. It has been unanimously reported three times from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I do not remember that my attention was called to it before. In the district of Florida there are great distances to travel. There are some places where there are very few steamers, but they are required to go over an extended coast of 1,400 miles, requiring a great deal of labor and constant attention, while the number of steamers to be inspected may happen to be less than the number required for a very moderate compensation to the inspector.

Mr. FRYE. I think there is no inspector now in Florida who gets over $1,200 a year.

Mr. CALL. The bill reduces the compensation of some inspectors, I understand.

Mr. FRYE. The compensation does not go below $1,200 anywhere. That matter was taken into account by the inspection department, which considered the bill carefully.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMESTOWN AND NORTHERN RAILWAY.

The bill (S. 175) granting a right of way to the Jamestown and Northern Railway through the Devils Lake Indian Reservation, in the State of North Dakota, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The bill (S. 1209) to regulate enlistments in the Army of the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I ask that the bill may retain its place on the Calendar and be passed over. There are several Senators now absent who desire to be present when it is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over without prejudice.

HEIRS OF CHARLES B. SMITH.

The bill (S. 1312) for the relief of the heirs of Charles B. Smith, deceased, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to readjust and close the subsistence and quartermaster's accounts, upon the books of the Treasury, of Charles B. Smith, deceased, late a first lieutenant in the Fifth Iowa Cavalry, and to pay Julia A. Smith, widow of Charles B. Smith, the pay and allowances due him at the date of his death, notwithstanding the fact that the pay and allowances have heretofore been applied in the adjustment of his subsistence and quartermaster's accounts.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

FANNY B. RANDOLPH AND DORA L. STARK.

The bill (S. 1412) for the relief of Fanny B. Randolph and Dora L. Stark was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Fanny B. Randolph, or her legal representative, $8,280; and to Dora L. Stark, or her legal representative, $8,280, making in all $16,560, the same being in full for, and the receipts of the same to be taken and accepted in full and final discharge of, their claim examined, investigated, and reported favorably by the Court of Claims of the United States, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1883, entitled "An act to afford assistance and relief to Congress and the Executive Departments in the investigation of claims and demands against the Government," and the act of March 3, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the bringing of suits against the Government of the United States."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORMS OF DEEDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 832.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 832) to simplify the form of deeds of conveyance, trusts, and releases of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. ALLEN to add to section 4 the following proviso:

Provided, That the grantor in the trust deed, his heirs or assigns, may redeem the trust property so sold, at any time within one year after the sale, by the payment of the principal and interest of the debt and all legal costs of such sale.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, since the bill was under consideration on Monday of this week I have had some time to examine it more carefully than I had examined it before, and I find it radically wrong in many respects.

The first section provides for a short form of trust deed which is to operate as a mortgage. It is given as security for the indebtedness of the grantor. The second section, as it appears in the bill reported by the committee, makes no limitation whatever as to the liability of the grantor or grantors upon the covenants of the deed. I will read the second section for the purpose of showing this fact:

SEC. 2. That if in any instrument as aforesaid the words "with general warranty" shall be used after the word "conveys" (or "convey") the grantor or grantors shall be deemed and held to covenant for himself, herself, or themselves, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, to forever warrant and defend the title to the premises conveyed unto the grantee or grantees, his, her, or their heirs and assigns, for and against the lawful claims of all persons whomsoever.

Now, there is not here the ordinary limitation that follows a deed of covenants. The liability of the grantor under a deed of this kind would reach every lawful claim that could be made against the property, whether it originated through the grantor or not. Certainly this section ought to be amended so as to confine the liability arising on the deed to claims growing up through or under the grantor.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from Nebraska will permit me, he certainly has not caught the meaning of the second section. If he will compare it with the third section he will see the distinction which is drawn in every statute of conveyance I have ever seen in the United States between what is a general warranty and a special warranty. If a party desires to warrant the title of property against himself and all other persons, he uses the term "general warranty." In the common law he has to do that by writing out the covenant in full. Statutory provisions in all the States have applied the words "general warranty" to that covenant, and this proposed statute simply follows the usual statutory form, designating and explaining by statutory declaration what the term "general warranty" means. Special warranty is provided for in the third section of the bill.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not think I am mistaken in the meaning of the second section. Under the holdings of the courts of this country the word "warranty," unless it is limited by other language, is held to embrace the substance of all the five covenants in a deed of full covenant at the common law. So the word "warranty," without any limitation, under the holdings of our courts, embraces everything that was embraced in a common-law deed of full covenants. I think that this section ought to be amended so as to confine the liability of the grantor in a deed of this kind to the lawful claims against the property that may arise by, through, or under him.

Mr. FAULKNER. Perhaps I did not correctly hear the first part of the Senator's remarks. To what character of deed does he suppose this section to refer?

Mr. ALLEN. I understand full well the difference between a deed of full covenant and a deed of limited covenants.

Mr. FAULKNER. Does the Senator refer to a deed of trust or a deed of bargain and sale?

Mr. ALLEN. I am referring to the deed that is mentioned in section 2 of the bill, which purports to be a deed of full covenant and without any limitation whatever.

Mr. FAULKNER. That does not refer to the question of a trust deed, but to a deed of bargain and sale, referred to in the first section.

Mr. ALLEN. In that respect this bill in my judgment is defective. It is defective in the third section, in so far as the words in line 21, page 3, "unless otherwise in the deed expressed," are concerned, which I think ought to be stricken out. I think also the words in line 23 "or substituted trustee or trustees" ought to be stricken out. It is a dangerous power to grant to the trustee, or to the beneficiary of a trust, the right to select a substituted trustee, a person who was not agreed upon.

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not suppose the Senator is familiar with the practice under this system. A substituted trustee is a trustee appointed by the court. It is where the trustee has died or for any reason is unable to carry out the trust and there is a default. Then the party has to apply to the court of equity to substitute a trustee in the place of the one the parties themselves agreed to.

Mr. ALLEN. That power exists completely without a statute. There is no court of equity in this country that will suffer a trust to fall for want of a trustee.

Mr. FAULKNER. And for that reason the bill does not provide for an application to a court as to its general equity power, and only refers to it in case the court has to act.

Mr. ALLEN. Then the words are clearly superfluous. If these words are not designed to confer the power upon the beneficiary of the deed to select a trustee in consequence of the incapacity or death of the trustee named, then they are useless in a deed of this kind, because a court of equity always has power, regardless of the terms of the deed, to appoint a trustee to carry into execution the trust. But it strikes me that hidden beneath these words is this monstrous power of the right of the grantee in the deed of trust or the beneficiary of the mortgaged estate to select some person of his own kind and his own choosing to carry into execution the power in the event the trustee dies or is incapacitated from executing it. I think those words ought to go out. In line 24, page 4 of the bill, these words occur:

In case of default in the payment of the debt or interest or any part thereof, according to the tenor and effect of the note, notes, bond, or bonds described, etc.

Then the power to sell the property is given. I think this bill is wrong in so far as it gives the grantee of the trust deed power to sell the property for the nonpayment of simply a small portion of the interest. I will admit that it is perfectly proper if a bond or note is given providing for the payment of interest at a stated period that the nonpayment of the interest should entitle the holder of the trust deed to foreclose and extinguish the title of the grantor, but the mere nonpayment of an insignificant portion of the interest at a specified time should never give the beneficiary of the trust the power to sell the entire estate.

Under this bill if a note for $100 were given, accompanied by a deed such as is provided for in the bill and the payment of interest quarterly, the grantee in the trust deed could sell a man out for the nonpayment of $2.50 interest. The entire estate and everything that the purchaser of the property had originally put into it could be sold and whistled down the wind in a few minutes without any remedy on the part of the grantor. That is one of the purposes of the bill.

As to the words which occur in lines 41, 42, and 43, on page 4 of the bill, I am frank to say that I can not tell what they mean. I think I know what they mean, but I am not certain. Speaking of the discharge of the trust deed after the execution of the trust, this language occurs:

And all of all liability on the part of the purchaser or purchasers to see to or account for the application of the purchase money.

I suppose that this means that the person purchasing at the trustees' sale takes a title entirely regardless of the question of whether the money arising from the sale of the property is properly applied or not. This makes him a purchaser in good faith without notice in a certain sense, and he has no liability and no concern whatever in regard to the application of the funds arising from the sale of the property, and is not concerned in seeing it applied in the discharge of the debt. It strikes me that that is wrong. Whenever a man invests money in trust property a moral if not a legal, obligation rests upon him to see that the powers conferred upon the trustee are executed in good faith and the money paid in the interest of the grantor. There is no reason why he should be exempted from liability by a provision of this kind. Good faith would require on his part some attention in seeing that the money went into the proper legal channel, and he ought not to be permitted to escape from liability in consequence of the insertion in a statute of language of this character. I think those words ought to be stricken out.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the Senator permit me to give the reason for that provision?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTON. When a grantor in a deed of trust and the beneficiary of that deed of trust are about to make a deed of trust to secure a loan from one to the other, they mutually agree upon a trustee. Why do they agree upon that trustee? Because each of them has confidence in the integrity of the man selected as the trustee. For that reason the purchaser should not be compelled to see to the application of the purchase money made by the man whom these two, the grantor and the grantee, have selected because of their personal confidence in him. It is a trust confided in him by the original parties to the deed of trust, and therefore the purchaser should not be required to see to the application of the purchase money.

Mr. ALLEN. The statement of the Senator from Virginia is all good enough in theory, but it does not work in practice. We are all familiar with the fact that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the trustee is the selection of the grantee of the trust deed rather than of the grantor.

Mr. HUNTON. Not a bit of it.

Mr. ALLEN. And the grantor by force of circumstances is compelled to assent to the selection made by the grantee. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] shakes his head as though that were not true. When a man is undertaking to purchase a home and has but little with which to purchase it, when he must depend in a great measure upon the generosity of the individual with whom he contracts, does not the Senator from Virginia know that the seller of that property and the holder of the security usually has his own way in the selection of a trustee?

Mr. HUNTON. I know no such thing.

Mr. ALLEN. Usually he has his own way in incorporating in the trust deed every condition for his own benefit and against the interest of the grantor. If the Senator from Virginia does not know it, I desire to say that I know it. I know it from observation; I know it from meeting these things for the last twenty-five or thirty years.

Beginning with the words "and to," in line 17, on page 5, and including lines 18, 19, and 20, on page 6, I think that language ought to be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the Senator to read the passage to which he refers.

Mr. ALLEN. After describing a release in section 4, on page 5 of the bill, this language occurs:

Shall be deemed sufficient—

Speaking of the legal force of the form of release—

Shall be deemed sufficient in form to fully discharge the mortgage or trust—

This is the language which I desire stricken out—and to vest in the releasee, or person or persons then claiming under such releasee, all the title and estate conveyed by the mortgage or trust deed.

The purpose of this language evidently is to cut off all liability of the purchaser of the trust property to an action by the grantor to redeem his property or to establish some equity or right in the property.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, he has misunderstood that section entirely. The section provides for a release of the deed of trust only in case the debt has been paid, and vests the property entirely in the original debtor. It is for his protection, and for the protection of nobody else, that this clause was inserted It was essential to use that language, because, under the common law form, it would have to be a regular conveyance, a deed of bargain and sale from the trustee back to the original debtor, the debt having been paid, but this short release form is given. Then the proposed statute goes on to declare that that short form of release shall have the same effect as a deed of bargain and sale from the trustee back to the debtor, to reinvest him with the title to the property, the debt having been discharged and paid.

Mr. ALLEN. Does not the Senator from West Virginia understand well enough that this short form of release is good in court, regardless of any statute?

Mr. FAULKNER. I do not. It does not establish and does not vest any title whatever, except by virtue of the terms of the statute.

Mr. ALLEN. There is not a court of equity in this country, in case a trust deed were paid off and discharged, which would not hold the execution of this form of release as perfect and complete.

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator will permit me, a court of equity would hold this was evidence of the payment of the trust, and if the debtor would go into a court of equity and present that evidence of payment, the court would appoint a commissioner to convey to the debtor the title of the property which had been conveyed by him to the trustee before the payment of the debt by the debtor. What I mean is the debtor would have to go into a court of equity, if it were not for this proposed statutory provision, to get the title back in himself. No court of records would record such a release without a statutory provision, nor would it under the common law, where it is in operation, vest in the debtor the title which he had conveyed to the trustee.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from West Virginia is clearly wrong. It is not the release that revests title to the property; it is the payment and discharge of the trust deed that operates to revest the title in the grantor of the trust deed; it is the act of payment which puts the title back in the grantor of that deed, and any court of record in this country having jurisdiction would hold this short form of release as admissable in evidence in a suit to quiet title to the property.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose the Senator is thoroughly familiar with mortgages, if he is not with deeds of trust, and I ask him, as a lawyer, whether, after a mortgagor has conveyed his title to the mortgagee to secure a debt and the mortgagee has paid that debt, whether the title by virtue of the payment is reinvested in the mortgagee? I admit that the evidence of payment is sufficient to enable a court of equity to appoint a commissioner to reconvey that property.

Mr. HOAR. After default?

Mr. FAULKNER. No, after payment by the debtor of the amount.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator means after payment in strict pursuance of the condition?

Mr. FAULKNER. In strict pursuance of the condition. In the case of a mortgage, after default the chain of title would not be perfect on the records of the court, that is in the recorder's office and the deed books, until there had been a reconveyance. As the trustee has no legal title when the debt is paid, this short form of release simply reinvests the grantor with that title, and is allowed to be recorded, which shows the chain of title perfect in the original grantor. That is the universal practice.

Mr. ALLEN. It pains me very much to disagree with the Senator from West Virginia, but when he speaks of a mortgagee conveying a title to property to the mortgagee, he speaks of something impossible in this country. A mortgage does not convey title to property; it never did convey title to property in this country, excepting a chattel mortgage, which conveys a legal title; but according to the holdings of our courts a mortgage is simply a lien upon the property, and the title never vests in the mortgagee or in a purchaser under the mortgagee until the equity of redemption is extinguished by foreclosure.

That brings me to a remark of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] made on Monday in discussing this question. The Senator mentioned the definition of a mortgage as being a dead pledge. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that in the jurisprudence of this country there is no such a thing as a dead pledge, and that the instrument called a mortgage has changed greatly from its original meaning. At the time mentioned by the Senator from Massachusetts, something like three or four hundred years ago, it was essential for the mortgagor to redeem his property before the law day to prevent a title vesting in the mortgagee, and if he failed to do so the property became a dead pledge, and title passed to the mortgagee; but there never was a time in the history of the common law, there never was a time in the history of the civil law when a mortgage before the law day conveyed a full title to the mortgagee.

It was only after the pledge had become dead, after the failure to redeem the property within the life of the mortgage that title was conveyed. Under the holdings, however, of our courts in this country, or of a great majority of them, a mortgage does not even convey a title; it simply conveys a lien upon the property, which must be perfected by foreclosure; and it makes no difference about the law day, it can come and pass, and yet the mortgage confers no title upon the mortgagee unless foreclosed. The equity of redemption stands there for all time until by some means pointed out by law it is extinguished.

In another thing of which the Senator from Massachusetts spoke the other day, in my judgment he erred, which was that this condition is really for the benefit of the debtor. I have not heard the Senator from West Virginia or the Senator from Massachusetts say anything particularly about the benefit of the creditor in such a case, but they are looking after the benefit of the debtor, the man who executes this form of deed, and it has been argued that the sooner the property could be sacrificed and turned into money the better off the man who executed the deed will be. The Legislatures of a majority of the States of this Union do not look upon this question in that light. They have provided humane laws for the stay of execution, prescribing a reasonable length of time for the redemption of property after sale which is mortgaged, and in my judgment it is found in those communities where that rule is adopted to be of very great benefit to the making and founding of homes and ample security for the man who invests his money in a mortgage.

It is for the purpose of protecting the home builders of this country that laws of this kind are introduced, and at the same time for the purpose of giving to the lender of money his principal, his interest, his costs, and everything which he contracts for, everything which he is in equity entitled to, before the debtor is permitted to redeem his property. So nothing is to be subserved, no useful end is to be accomplished, by selling a man out of his home within three or four or five or ten days after default.

Section 10; lines 5, 6, and 7, in my judgment should be stricken out. I will read the whole section to show the force of the words I desire to have stricken out:

SEC. 10. That no covenant or promise by a lessee that he will leave the premises in good repair shall have the effect, if the buildings are destroyed by fire or otherwise without fault or negligence on his part, of binding him to erect such buildings again, or to pay for the same or any part thereof—

Then come the words to which I especially object—unless there be other words showing it to be the intent of the parties that he shall be so bound.

This language is evidently meant to give the loaner of money the power over his debtor of exacting a contract out of him which, when foreclosed, will deprive him of every dollar of money he has invested in the property and render him liable, in addition, to construct upon the property, if the buildings are burned, new buildings, or render him liable for damages for a failure to do so. It is one of those provisions the practical effect of which is that when the mortgage or the trust deed—and in this respect a trust deed is not different from a mortgage—is foreclosed, to take every dollar the debtor has in the property and render him personally liable and his other property liable to be sacrificed for a failure to construct upon that property destroyed buildings. That is another of the secret provisions of the bill, the hidden purposes of the bill, to cast the burden upon the debtor who executes a contract of this kind.

Mr. President, I do not stand here to ask for unusual provisions for persons who execute these contracts. I wish to see the debtor and creditor put upon an equality; I wish to see the rights of both of those classes of persons protected; I wish to see the man who loans his money get his money and interest and costs up to the very last moment, while I desire, upon the other hand, to see the man who has invested his little all in a home protected in the privilege of redeeming that home from a forced sale.

It is a little singular that in the report accompanying this bill there is not a syllable or a sentence showing the necessity for a bill of this kind in this District. The committee in the report simply says:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 832) to simplify the forms of deeds of conveyance, trust, and releases of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, have considered the same and recommend that it do pass as amended.

Then the report speaks of striking out a word here and a word there, and inserting different words in their places, but there is not a thing in the report which shows that any public purpose or any end of justice will be subserved by the passage of the bill. The bill is as silent as the grave upon that question. The committee have not seen fit to enlighten the Senate upon the necessity for the passage of a measure of this kind. If the interests of creditors in the District of Columbia are imperiled in consequence of the present method of doing business, certainly the Committee on the District of Columbia should have enlightened us upon that subject; if the interests of the other class are improved by reason of the passage of the bill, we should have been told so, and told in what respect their condition would be improved by it. But there is nothing here to guide any Senator in this Chamber in voting upon the bill.

Mr. President, yesterday morning the Washington Post contained a supplement, which I hold in my hand [exhibiting], containing thirty columns of solid matter set in very small type, almost diamond type, of real estate in this city to be sold for the nonpayment of taxes. A hurried calculation shows that there are 8,400 pieces of property now being advertised in this city to be sold at tax sale for sums running from 50 cents to $1.50 up to 13, 14, 15, and more dollars, showing a singularly distressed condition of a great portion of the people of the city of Washington.

Who are the persons who are thus affected? Who are the persons whose homes are to be sold out for 50 cents or $1.50? They are persons who are undertaking to establish homes in this city; they are the poor people, the working people, the clerks, the industrial classes. So great is the stress of their circumstances, so great is the struggle for a bare existence upon their part and for their families, that they are unable to pay a tax of 50 cents or $1, or $1.50 to save their homes from the purchaser at a tax sale. Yet, Mr. President, in the face of this fact, which is astounding and appalling, we are urged here to pass a bill which is to add to the burdens of this class of people, and not only give the tax-purchaser a chance at these humble homes, but to give the loaner of money a speedy chance at those homes as well, so that the occupants of those homes, who have worked hard to build them, may be, with their families, literally thrown into the streets, with no protection and no means of subsistence, except as they receive it at the hands of charitably disposed persons.

I submit that there is nothing wrong either to the debtor or the creditor to adopt the amendment giving a right to redeem the property within a reasonable time after it is sold. If the creditor receives his money—and that is all he contracts for—his principal and interest and all costs to which he has been put, within one year after the sale of the property by the trustee, then, certainly, the purposes of justice have been answered in his case, and he has nothing of which to complain; he has received all he contracted for; he has received all which, in justice and equity, he ought to receive; and by that means the poor person, who was in default for payment in consequence of sickness or misfortune of some kind or lack of employment, has an opportunity within that year to get the money to pay off his debt and save the money which he has placed in this little home. He ought to have that right. It is but justice that he should have that right; and anything which extinguishes his title sooner, anything which extinguishes his title before he is given an opportunity to redeem, is unjust to him, unjust to society, and unjust even to the creditor himself.

That tells the tale of the humble homes in this city [exhibiting the Washington Post]. Eight thousand four hundred pieces of property are now ready to be sold for the nonpayment of taxes, running from a few cents to a few dollars.

There is another important question which ought to be considered in this measure, and I call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to it, which is, whether a title to real estate can be extinguished by a foreclosure of this character—by a mere sale? There is nothing better settled in the constitutional jurisprudence of this country than that every man is entitled to his day in court before his rights of property can be extinguished. He must have an opportunity to come into court and present his case to the court and have a judgment upon his rights before he can be concluded.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the fact that the great majority of the courts of last resort in the States of this Union are holding to-day that a title can not be extinguished in this form.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTON. Does the Senator mean to state to the Senate that any State in this Union has decided that a fair and bona fide sale under a deed of trust, in strict compliance with the terms of that deed, and the sale carried into effect by the execution of a deed, does not convey a title to the purchaser?

Mr. ALLEN. That is exactly what I mean to assert.

Mr. HUNTON. I should like to see the authority for the Senator's assertion.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall take great pleasure in showing it to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON. Let the Senate see it, too.

Mr. ALLEN. I mean to assert not only that, but I mean to assert that there are States in this Union where there are statutes against a title of that kind.

Mr. HUNTON. That is another thing.

Mr. ALLEN. There are cases where already courts have decided against such titles and where State Legislatures have followed up the decision by enacting statutes against such titles.

Mr. HUNTON. Of course, the Legislature of a State can enact such a law, but I am talking about a case where there has been a sale under a deed of trust in srtict compliance with its terms, and no statute in that State which sets aside that sale; that such a sale and such a conveyance conveys a bona fide title, which can not be impugned in any court.

Mr. ALLEN. I mean to assert exactly that. I say there are States in this Union where this precise question has been settled by the court of last resort, where they held that a sale of this kind is not due process of law, and does the Senator from Virginia claim that this is due process of law?

Mr. HUNTON. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. Is there any due process of law in this country except where the party has his day in court? Is that not what the words "due process of law" mean? They mean that the party must be brought into court, that he must be given a trial by jury, if the case be a law action, or by the chancellor, if it be a chancery proceeding; and I assert to the Senator from Virginia that there are not only courts in one State, but there are courts in more than one State in this Union, which have held that a sale of property under the terms of a trust deed is not "due process of law" where a trust deed is given as security for money and where in equity it is a mortgage.

Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia, because he is an excellent lawyer, one or two questions. Does the form of a conveyance determine the character of the conveyance? If it is given as a security for money, is it not a mortgage? If it is an absolute deed, if it is a trust deed in form, or whatever the form of the contract may be, if that contract is given to secure the payment of money, is it not in equity a mortgage?

Mr. HUNTON. Of course it is.

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly; the Senator from Virginia says it is. If it is a mortgage once, is it not a mortgage for all time until the equity of redemption of the mortgagor is extinguished? How do you extinguish it? You extinguish it by a process of foreclosure; and I ask the Senator from Virginia how he is going to extinguish the equity of redemption of a mortgagor unless he extinguishes that equity of redemption in court?

Mr. HUNTON. I will answer the question. We are not dealing with a mortgage in this bill; we are dealing with a deed of trust. While it is true that the mortgagee has to go into court to foreclose his mortgage, this bill provides for an entirely different thing, in the shape of a deed of trust, which does not require the parties to go into court merely for the purpose of foreclosing, unless there be some other question involved, like the invalidity or illegality of the debt or its payment, or some fraud which will induce the parties to carry it into court. Then a deed of trust may be executed as well and as effectually out of court as by a decree of a court.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Virginia says this is a deed of trust, and not a mortgage. In the days of the war, when horses were scarce, they used to call a mule "a horse by brevet," but it did not change the character of the animal at all. So when the Senator says this is a trust deed, he is simply sticking in the bark. It is a mortgage, to all intents and purposes. Let me read for the benefit of the Senator:

This deed of trust made this [date], between [the grantor or grantors] of the first part——

Mr. HUNTON. From what page of the bill does the Senator read?

Mr. ALLEN. I read from section 4, on page 3, beginning in line 4:

and [the trustee or trustees] of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party (or parties) of the first part, in consideration of the debt hereinafter specified doth (or do) convey unto the party (or parties) of the second part the following-described land in the [here insert location and description of the property] in trust to secure to [the party secured] payment of the sum of [amount] dollars, on account of [here state character of debt] and interest thereon, the said debt and interest being payable according to the tenor and effect of [here insert the number and description of the note or notes, bond or bonds, etc.].

That states the language of a mortgage. The purpose of this anomalous instrument of conveyance is to secure a debt: it is to pledge property to the payment of the debt, accompanied by bonds or notes, and whenever it is given for the payment of a debt, pledging property as security for the payment of that debt, the Senator from Virginia admits with me that whatever name it may have, it amounts in equity to nothing less than a mortgage. If it were a deed of full covenants and conveyed an absolute legal title to the estate, and yet the purpose was to secure the payment of a debt, in equity it is a mortgage. This deed, so called, is nothing more than a mortgage, and I assert that the equity of redemption can not be extinguished under that instrument until the grantor has his day in court and is cut off by the decree of the court foreclosing the mortgage.

This is all I desire to say at this time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. FAULKNER. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska will not be agreed to. All the members of the committee are opposed to it.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia a question, if he will permit me?

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course.

Mr. ALLEN. Will not the Senator fix some time in this bill for redemption—any reasonable time?

Mr. FAULKNER. The difference between the distinguished Senator from Nebraska and myself is simply this, that he has been in the habit of practicing under a system in which the idea of redemption came in. In the District of Columbia and in the States of Maryland, Virginia, and West Virginia, which surround the District, this form of proceeding has always been pursued, and I am unwilling on a bill of this character to change the whole practice of this District in reference to this question. I believe it would be detrimental to the interests of the borrowers of this District to do so; I believe it would increase the difficulty of their obtaining proper and fair loans; I believe at the same time it would have a tendency to depreciate the price of property when it is sold under the terms of the deed if a year should be given for redemption.

I believe the effect of such a provision as that would be to take from the property the opportunity of being bid for by legitimate bidders who desire to own it and transfer into the hands of simple speculators in real estate and in the distress of the people, the purchase of that property at a trustees' sale. No one who wanted to live on the property and wanted to own it legitimately would think for one moment of buying such property and receiving a deed, to have it taken from him within six months or within twelve months.

For these reasons, in addition to the fact that there is no subsequent provision to carry out the theory upon which the Senator has offered his amendment, which could avoid the confusion necessarily attaching to the records of this District as to the chain of title to property, I am compelled to say frankly that I do not think the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Nebraska thinks that the practice in this District for years, with no complaint from the people of the District, should be changed and made to conform to that prevailing in certain States, let the Senator introduce a bill and have that bill referred to the appropriate committee, the Judiciary Committee, and let them bring in a bill which will in all of its provisions conform one to the other, and make such a bill as will not confuse titles in the District of Columbia. That is all I ask.

The purpose of this bill was really not to change the law, except as to the form of conveyance. That is all there is in this bill. In reference to deeds of bargain and sale, in reference to deeds of trust, in reference to deeds of release, its object is only to simplify the forms and to give them the validity and authority of law without the common-law proceeding or forms which have heretofore been in existence in this District.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in that connection?

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course.

Mr. CHANDLER. Was it the intention of the committee that conveyances ordinarily in the District of Columbia should not contain a covenant against incumbrances or a covenant that the grantor is seized and possessed of title?

Mr. FAULKNER. The covenant of general warranty as construed by the courts covers that. The only difference is that where you make a covenant in præsenti, you may be able in a special covenant of that character to sue upon it before there has been an ouster, which the general warranty and the general clause which is usually written in the deed in the same language that is used here would not permit you to do until after there had been a breach and ouster by the party.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then, about the covenant against existing incumbrances, is it the intention of the committee to have that left out of the ordinary conveyance?

Mr. FAULKNER. Not at all, because any kind of a covenant can be put in which the parties choose, and if you put in the special covenant to which the Senator refers it gives the purchaser at once a right to sue under that covenant, even before the debt becomes due between the debtor and his creditor.

Mr. CHANDLER. But unless the special covenant against incumbrances is contained in the deed that right would not exist.

Mr. FAULKNER. For example, under the language of this bill, construing what is the meaning of "general warranty," in order to bring a suit, if there was a lien upon the property purchased by deed of trust, that deed of trust would have to be enforced and the land sold, and the purchaser from the grantor deprived of his possession and title.

Mr. HOAR. Suppose the grantee had assigned to somebody?

Mr. FAULKNER. If the grantee had assigned, that would be all right; because, having given the general warranty, that general warranty as to the title of the property follows with the land in the hands of any subsequent purchaser who has such warranty from his vendor.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will allow me a question, I ask if the general warranty runs with the land as a benefit whether the statute of limitations would apply and prevent an action thereon after a time?

Mr. FAULKNER. A general warranty?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. FAULKNER. The statute of limitations could never apply until after the breach of the warranty.

Mr. ALLEN. But after a breach of the warranty it runs with the land and inures to the benefit of the subsequent purchaser, and the right of action upon it becomes limited by the statute of limitations, does it not?

Mr. FAULKNER. I can not state to the Senator what have been the judicial decisions in this District with reference to that question.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to put a question to the Senator from West Virginia, if the Chair will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FAULKNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator whether in this District a man can convey a title to real estate of which he is disseized at the time of the conveyance?

Mr. FAULKNER. I suppose by reason of the effect given to a deed of bargain and sale that perhaps he could—I mean there would be no liability upon him by reason of the conveyance, unless he had a covenant similar to the one here of a general warranty.

Mr. HOAR. It is a very different question whether there is a liability and whether anything passes. My question is whether anything passes. In Massachusetts, if a party is disseized of land he can not convey anything; his conveyance is barren; and that is the case in many of the old States. I do not know how it is in the new States.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think that there is no question that that is so in all of the States.

Mr. HOAR. How is it in the District of Columbia?

Mr. FAULKNER. I think it is so here unquestionably.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then I desire to make the criticism—and I should like the attention of my friend, the Senator from West Virginia—that this provision does not provide for two or three covenants which are upon what is known as a common covenant, and which are very important, a covenant that the man has a good right to sell, a covenant of freedom from incumbrances, and a covenant of seizin, which is pretty nearly the same thing as the covenant that he has a right to sell. It is another way of saying pretty much the same thing, because it says that the general warranty is to be construed to forever warrant and defend the title. Now, to forever warrant and defend the title is not broken until there is an actual ouster, which may not happen for twenty years or fifty years.

Then the third section provides that a special warranty shall be a warranty of the grantor to forever warrant and defend the title against the claims and demands of the grantor and those claiming under him. Now, if there be an existing mortgage on a piece of land which I undertake to convey to the Senator from West Virginia, or if I am disseized, or if I have not a good right to sell and convey those covenants and I have covenanted that I am seized and that I have a good right to sell, and covenanted against the incumbrance, they are covenants of present debts and they are broken as soon as they are made.

Now, what is the effect of this bill if it passes? Certainly you ought to have a right to bring your suit the moment you discover the incumbrance and not to wait twenty or thirty years, when the grantor may be insolvent, or dead, or the transaction may be gone. If a man sells to you with such an incumbrance you ought to be able to sue him to-morrow and get the amount of incumbrance or damages. If he sells to you, being disseized, so that nothing passes, you ought to be able to sue him to-morrow and get damages. If he sells to you and has not any right to sell, you ought to be able to sue him to-morrow.

Therefore, what is the result of this measure? You have either got to write into the deed those special covenants, in which you have shortened or simplified the conveyance only one word, because you only substitute for the words "I will warrant and defend" the words "with general warranty." It puts in two long words instead of three short ones; that is all. And you have also misled the purchaser, especially if he is not a lawyer, into supposing that you have a form of conveyance with warranty which is adequate to all the ordinary exigencies and requirements of a conveyance. You will have hundreds of such conveyances in this District where the purchaser will find out that there is a mortgage on the property.

Mr. FAULKNER. I think I can explain to the Senator that the purchaser has insured himself against that situation.

Mr. HOAR. He has insured himself by getting a contract under which the owner or holder of the mortgage may refrain from ousting him for fifty years, and can not get any remedy unless he goes into a court of equity. You will not have your simple common law remedy under the contract for fifty years.

Mr. FAULKNER. Of course, under this bill——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from West Virginia allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to submit that it is very evident we shall not act upon the pending amendment and the passage of the bill without a yea-and-nay vote. There is at least one reason why I hope we shall not come to a yea-and-nay vote this evening. That being true, if the Senator from West Virginia will yield to me, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FAULKNER. I should like to answer just one remark made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply make the suggestion to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HOAR. I wish the Senator from Tennessee would allow me to say one word more on this part of the bill, because I do not wish to take the floor again if I can help it.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly; I do so with pleasure.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Nebraska, I understand, proposes to require in all cases of sale under these mortgages or trust deeds, first, that the buyer shall see to the application of the purchase money and shall take upon himself all the risks of questions as to the proper amount of expenses to be charged, as to the validity of claims or incumbrances that are set up, as to tax titles, and all the other questions that shall arise.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Let me state my point, and then I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Next, and what is most important, he proposes that there shall be a right of redemption for at least twelve months from the time of sale. The result of the Senator's amendments, especially the last one, as I humbly conceive, will be that nobody can buy any property at a mortgage sale but a speculator or a shark. A man mortgages his house; he buys a piece of land and puts a house on it, and borrows the money. He is an honest, industrious workman, and he gives a mortgage. He gets into difficulty and can not pay it, and the property has to be sold. Nobody can buy it if he wants it for a house, because he can not move into it without the danger of having to move out of it at any time, in twelve, six, or three months, when the redemption may take place.

Nobody is going to buy it who is going to fit it up for his own convenience or comfort. Nobody can buy it who is going to let it to other people as a permanent investment, and who will be expected when a new tenant goes in to fit it up with water appliances, or ranges, or with the new necessities for comfortable living, of which I dare say the fancy of Senators will suggest forty. So I will not say under a guise, but under a purpose, an honest, a humane purpose to benefit these debtors, the Senator from Nebraska might just as well write into the legislation of the District of Columbia a provision that whenever a man gives a mortgage and his property is to be sold for the debt, the debtor having the interest to get all he can after the payment back to himself of the debt, nobody shall buy but a land shark or a speculator. I do not myself think that is a good thing for poor householders.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. FAULKNER. How long will my friend from Nebraska take? I wish to allow the Senator from Tennessee to make the motion he has indicated.

Mr. ALLEN. I think I ought to say that the Senator from Massachusetts entirely misapprehends my position. I did not say that the purchaser at the trust sale should take upon himself all liability as to the correct disbursement of the money. I made no remark of that kind, and did not intend that an inference of that character should be drawn. I meant simply to say that his liability should remain exactly as it is to-day at common law, regardless of the language of the bill.

One more remark. I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that in the great States of the Mississippi Valley where they have these stay laws, and where the right of redemption exists, the rule I mention does not have the effect the Senator from Massachusetts says it has. There are a great many millions of people in this country who know that these stay laws, and laws for the redemption of property, are very humane and operate in furtherance of the ends of justice. Instead of being a means to encourage and fatten the money sharks and the gambler in money, it has the effect of permitting thousands of people to save their homes who could not do so otherwise.

Mr. FAULKNER. Mr. President, I shall occupy only a moment of the time of the Senate. I wish to explain my understanding of these two covenants. The two covenants under the form of the deeds to day are written in the deeds in the language in which the bill construes the terms "general warranty" and "special warranty:" and the object and purpose of giving the meaning to the words general and special warranty, as provided in the bill, is simply to save the writing of some forty words instead of three, as the Senator from Massachusetts suggests.

I wish to state further that these covenants do not in any way prevent any additional covenants that are known to legal conveyances for the protection of the rights of the parties to a contract, but that throughout this whole section of country, in the three States surrounding the District, it has generally been given a certain construction by the courts, which is thoroughly familiar to lawyers and to the parties residing in them. Any additional covenant as to seizin, as to prior incumbrance, so as to give the party the right of action immediately he ascertains the covenant has not been complied with by the grantor, may be added to the covenant as can be done to-day and as they are added to covenants very often to-day.

The only difference between having that as a part of the general warranty and leaving it as it is to-day is because if there is an incumbrance upon the land when sold by the grantor the purchaser from the grantor can not bring suit against the grantor until the incumbrance has been in force and he has suffered damages by reason of the enforcement of an incumbrance existing upon the land at the time of his purchase, whereas, under the covenant suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, suit can be instituted at the very moment the purchaser ascertains that there has been a violation on the part of the grantor of the covenant he has made.

Mr. CHANDLER. May I ask the Senator from West Virginia a question?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it is not the intention of the committee in providing the forms to exclude other covenants, why should not the committee submit to have go into the proposed statute the forms of these covenants, so as to make the statute a complete conveyance?

Mr. FAULKNER. If the Senator from New Hampshire can suggest more abbreviated language for these different forms than that ordinarily used in deeds of conveyances, to cover the suggestions made by himself and the Senator from Massachusetts, he will find the committee ready at any time to accept such an amendment. But the covenants to which the Senator refers are so brief in language that the committee did not think it was necessary to proceed to embody them in the proposed statute, as it would be almost impossible to abbreviate the language.

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Tennessee to allow me to offer an amendment to be printed.

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer an amendment to the pending bill and ask that it be read and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of section 4, on page 5:

All sales of land under powers of sale in deeds of trusts and mortgages in the District of Columbia shall be made only by order of court upon foreclosure proceedings in equity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection the amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a resolution and ask its adoption.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is instructed to examine and report whether the simulation of coins of the United States by coins of the same weight, metal, and fineness, except as authorized by law, is made criminal by the acts defining and punishing the counterfeiting of coins of the United States, or of other countries, and if not to report a bill to prevent and punish such simulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. My attention has been called to a possible defect in the law with respect to counterfeiting as to whether it would embrace the simulation of coins by putting in a counterfeited or simulated coin the exact weight, metal, and fineness required for a genuine coin. Doubts have been suggested in newspapers as to whether the existing statutes cover such a case. My own opinion, hastily formed, is that the existing law contained in sections 5457 and 5461 of the crimes statute will cover the case. Still doubts have been expressed about it, and to show that the inquiry is imminent, I ask leave to have read a telegram which I cut from a newspaper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEARCHING FOR A PRIVATE MINT—IT HAS COINED HALF A MILLION AND HAS MADE BIG PROFITS FROM SEIGNIORAGE.

OMAHA, NEBR., March 19.

Four special Treasury secret-service men, in addition to the regular force employed at division headquarters and the forces of the United States marshal's office, are working in Omaha and vicinity to unearth a private mint which is alleged to have turned out over a half million standard silver dollars, using the same amount of silver and alloy as the Government. The plant has been in operation some time, and, it is said, it is impossible to detect the difference between the money made by the counterfeiters and the genuine turned out by the Federal mints. The profits of the gang are made from the seigniorage, which is said to give to the makers a rake-off of 51 cents on each dollar made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution. There can be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the same.

Mr. ALLEN. The Senator from Ohio is not audible on this side of the Chamber. I should like to know from what paper the extract which has been read was taken.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cut it from the Cincinnati Commercial.

Mr. ALLEN. It is simply a press dispatch?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cut it from the Cincinnati Commercial of yesterday or day before yesterday. I can not hear the Senator from Nebraska very well.

Mr. ALLEN. He simply clipped a press dispatch from some newspaper?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; it is a press dispatch from Omaha, stating what had been done by certain officers of the United States in the endeavor to detect and prevent this crime.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he has any other evidence showing a violation of the law in this respect aside from that contained in the dispatch which has been read?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; I have seen the statement in other papers. The fact is well known that in France, Great Britain, and Germany the same thing is being done with their minor coins. Their laws no doubt punish it as counterfeiting. It is counterfeiting, and it ought to be so punished. I think myself, under the statute as it now stands it is sufficiently covered, but I can see that there are points probably which no one contemplated at the time the law was passed. The law was passed in 1866, and it contemplated a disparity of metal in the two coins.

Mr. COCKRELL. The resolution is all right.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if he proposes to confine the inquiry to subsidiary or token coinage like the nickel coinage, or if the principal offense be in counterfeiting our legal-tender coins of silver.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is that section 5462 is confined to the minor coins, as they are called; that it does not embrace the fractional coins which are parts of the silver dollar. As a matter of course in 1866 when the law was passed there was no difference in the intrinsic value of the different metals, and therefore there was no occasion for a specification in the law. The law was undoubtedly passed to protect the minor coins, cents, etc., but I am inclined to think that the language is broad enough to cover the dollar as well.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me it is a rather remarkable commentary upon our national system of coinage, having a little of the comic element in it, that we are obliged to introduce measures to make it a crime to furnish the people of the United States with coined money of full weight and fineness. Perhaps, however, it may be necessary. I defer to my honorable friend in this as in all matters connected with finance, but it would seem that if most of the financial arguments which have been made in this body for the last two years on both sides of the question are sound it would be a good thing to multiply all the coins of full weight and fineness. Still I do not propose to interfere with the Senator's resolution.

Mr. MANDERSON. I have no objection to the resolution. I simply desire to say that I have read, as I presume most Senators have read, the rumor of the coinage of a vast number, perhaps half a million silver dollars imitating the silver dollar of the Government and perhaps of equal value with it except that it has not the stamp of the Government. I do not believe it can be possible that under the law there is no way of reaching one who coins the money of the United States Government, and places upon it that which imitates the coinage of the Government but if there is any doubt on that question of course it should be investigated and a statute should quickly be passed to cure that defect.

As far as the rumor is concerned I do not believe there is anything in it. My confidence in the community in which I live would lead me to suppose that no members of it could be guilty of an act of this character, although we are very anxious west of the Missouri River for an increase of the circulating medium of the country.

Mr. STEWART. When coinage was suspended in India it was predicted that there would be a large amount of rupees coined on private account not only in India, but all over the East. I understand that there has been a mint established at Bombay to coin Mexican dollars. Undoubtedly this business will go on in some countries. In order to make it effective and destroy silver entirely it will be necessary to have an international agreement and a universal criminal law before this evil can be reached. It has been discussed a great deal. The matter is so important, and it is so necessary, if we are going to enforce such a law, to have an international agreement, that I think the resolution had better lie over until we can have time to consider it in all its branches and in its bearings everywhere.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objections to striking out the instructions, although I think it is right to have the opinion of the Committee on the Judiciary on the subject. What is the objection made? I did not hear it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well; I have no objection to letting it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

SIOUX INDIAN FUNDS.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what sums of money, if any, have been paid out by the United States, to what band of Indians paid, and when paid, under and by virtue of the stipulations of the treaty of 1836 and 1851 with the Wahpaykootay and Medaywakantoons bands of Sioux Indians; the former treaty having been made at St. Peters, Minn., and proclaimed February 15, 1837, and the latter treaty having been made at Mendota, Minn., August 5, 1851, and proclaimed February 24, 1853. Also, what sums have been paid, to whom, and when paid, under a treaty with the same Indians made at the city of Washington June 19, 1858, and proclaimed March 31, 1859; and also to inform the Senate what sums would now be due under such treaties, if the same were in force, and what sum or sums would be due to what was a portion of said bands of Indians, but now known as the Santee Sioux Indians residing at this time on the Santee Agency, in the State of Nebraska, as near as the same can be ascertained.

THE FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, or any subcommittee thereof appointed by its chairman, is hereby instructed to inquire into the present condition of the five civilized tribes of Indians, and of the white citizens dwelling among them, and the legislation required and appropriate to meet the needs and welfare of such Indians; and for that purpose to visit Indian Territory, to take testimony, have power to send for persons and papers, and examine witnesses under oath; and shall report the result of such inquiry, with recommendations for legislation; the actual expenses of such inquiry to be paid on approval of the chairman out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. GORMAN. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 5575) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. VEST. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide additional accommodations for the Government Printing Office.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1462) to provide additional accommodations for the Government Printing Office.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY].

Mr. DOLPH. Let the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, empowered and instructed to purchase for and in the name of the United States, for the site of the Government Printing Office, by direct negotiation with the owners, the south half of square 673, containing about 213,815 square feet, and bounded as follows: Two hundred and seventy-three and one-fourth feet fronting on North Capitol street, along the same from the intersection of L street therewith to what is called Pierce or Babcock street; thence east along the same, extending through the said square for 782½ feet to First street; thence south along First street for 273½ feet to L street; thence west along the same for 782½ feet to point of beginning; or, failing to secure such described property by negotiation with the owners or a satisfactory title thereto, as may be approved by the Attorney-General of the United States, he is hereby empowered and directed to secure the same by condemnation proceedings, as provided in the act approved June 25, 1890, to authorize the acquisition of certain parcels of real estate embraced in square numbered 823 of the city of Washington to provide an eligible site for a city post-office: Provided, That the said south half of square 673 shall be acquired at a cost not exceeding the money appropriated in the sundry civil appropriation act, approved August 30, 1890, to provide accommodations for the Government Printing Office, hereby made available for the object of this act; and the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed, upon the requisition of the said Secretary, to pay the purchase, or, into court, the condemnation price of such property.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury, as soon as such site shall be acquired, will cause the Supervising Architect, with the advice of the Public Printer, to prepare the requisite plans for a Government printing establishment, fireproof all the way, which shall be fully equal to the prompt and efficient performance of the work now required by the Government, and such plans to be so arranged as to admit of progressive extensions, as the growing demand upon the establishment may, from time to time, come to acquire; and on account of the construction of such portion of the buildings of such plant as shall be deemed necessary for the present, $250,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 3. This act shall be in force from its passage.

Mr. QUAY. I understand the amendment pending is one offered by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] some time ago in my behalf during my absence, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase what in the discussion heretofore on this floor has been known as the Mahone lot.

Mr. VEST. I understand the amendment covers the Carroll property.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly the description as read covers the Mahone lot.

Mr. DOLPH. I understand the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming, which has been read, was introduced on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY].

Mr. QUAY. I was not present when the question was heretofore considered by the Senate——

Mr. VEST. The Senator from Wyoming introduced an amendment on his own account, proposing to select the Carroll property, as it is known, southeast from the Capitol.

Mr. DOLPH. Which amendment is pending?

Mr. VEST. Then the Senator from Wyoming, at the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania, submitted an amendment, which embraces what is known as the Mahone lot. The pending amendment, I understand, refers to the Carroll property.

Mr. CAREY. I think I offered the first amendment on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania, after having received a note from him. Then I offered an amendment on my own account for the purchase of what is known as the Carroll property. As I understand, the amendment which has just been read is the amendment I offered on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DOLPH. For the purchase of the Mahone lot?

Mr. CAREY. For the selection of the Mahone lot.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands.

Mr. QUAY. Is the question now being taken on the amendment of the Senator from Wyoming offered in my behalf or upon his own amendment?

Mr. CAREY. On the amendment I offered on behalf of the Senator.

Mr. DOLPH. One further inquiry. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if the provisions of the amendment for condemnation and the construction of a building are similar to those of the bill itself?

Mr. QUAY. I think so. My understanding is that this amendment is offered as a substitute for the bill reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and is exactly the proposition which was so ably supported in the last Congress by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], the present chairman of that committee. If I am in error in this statement he will correct me. The bill supported at the present time by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is the one which he so ably opposed in that Congress.

Mr. DOLPH. The amendment involves simply the question of a site?

Mr. QUAY. Of a site.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] does not contain the provisions in the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. The amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania leaves out entirely the provision in regard to the construction of the building under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Casey. It simply provides for the purchase of a site, and is the same as the bill which, as the Senator from Pennsylvania is pleased to observe rather facetiously, was supported by me at a former session of Congress. If it affords the Senator any pleasure to allude to that fact he is entirely welcome to it.

I have given my reasons for making the report of the committee in favor of a different site. The circumstances have entirely changed, as I had occasion to remark before. We have been warned by a terrible disaster in an insufficient building, occupied and owned by the Government in a different part of the city, that a recurrence of such a disaster must be avoided. It is of the essence of this discussion that we should as soon as possible provide accommodations for the people in the Public Printing Office, who are to-day suffering not only discomfort, but who are threatened with actual danger.

Mr. President, permit me to call the attention of the Senate to one single fact. The Senator from Wyoming told us several days ago that if we selected either the Mahone site or what is known as the Carroll site, both of which are entirely vacant, a building sufficient to accommodate the Public Printing Office could be put up in a few months. Mr. President, unless we possessed an Aladdin's lamp, our experience teaches us that nothing of the sort could be done. We commenced the construction of the city post-office here in June, 1850, and we are now barely up to the second story. We commenced the construction of the building for the Congressional Library over five years ago, and Senators can look at it to-day and see what progress has been made, though the work has been pressed by Gen. Casey as rapidly as possible.

I am warranted by my experience, and other Senators know that it is a fact, that to commence the construction of a building ab initio for the Public Printing Office will take from three to five years. If it were a private undertaking of course it would be different; but under the system adopted in regard to public buildings, where it is made the interest of every workman and contractor to protract the building as long as possible, it takes from two to three or five times as long to put up a building for the United States Government as for private parties.

If Senators want to take the responsibility in the face of the recommendations of the Public Printer, in the face of our past experience, of keeping 2,500 or 3,000 employés in a dangerous and insufficient building, when we can give them relief under the bill of the committee inside of six months, let them do it.

I care for no charge of inconsistency. I have done my duty honestly. After examining every site, after considering the condition of the Treasury, and, more than all, considering the condition of the employés in the old Printing Office, I am entirely satisfied with what I have done.

Mr. STEWART. I am very much impressed with the necessity for speedy action in securing a new Printing Office building. That is the reason why I am in favor of the Mahone lot. The ground proposed to be purchased at the old site is covered with buildings, and it would take considerable time before work could be commenced on any new structure. It may be a question, too, whether there will not be considerable time expended in getting a foundation in that low land. The Mahone lot is free from obstruction: a good foundation can be easily made there upon hard ground; while before the old débris can be taken from the land surrounding the present Printing Office and work started a new building might be well under way on the Mahone lot. One of my principal reasons for getting new ground is that a good foundation may be secured on land which has practically settled, where the building can be commenced immediately and prosecuted vigorously without any obstruction.

Mr. BUTLER. Is there not another reason, if the Senator will allow me, and that is that the Government printing may go on in the old Printing Office until the new building can be completed on the Mahone lot, so that there will be no delay in the public business.

Mr. STEWART. Certainly; the public printing can proceed if any new site is selected.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to make another inquiry. Is it not impossible on the ground adjacent to the present Printing Office to secure the 40 feet required for a public building erected for the use of the Government? I understand the policy of the Government is not to erect a public building within 40 feet of any other building. If I understand the dimensions of ground around the old Printing Office, a building there would have to come almost in contact with other buildings and with the street, which would be avoided, I understand, by adopting the Mahone lot.

Mr. STEWART. If it is a necessity to have the Public Printing Office at the old site, the Government ought to buy the entire block. There is no doubt about that. To have the building cramped in there will not answer for all future time. There is not land enough in the proposed purchase, and it will involve a greater purchase. Besides, on recurring to the question of expedition, if laborers are employed in tearing down the old buildings and preparing to erect new structures about the Printing Office, it will interfere with the operations of the Printing Office much more than would be the case at a short distance from there, where their work would not disturb the employés of the Government. It would make it exceedingly uncomfortable for the employés during the hot weather to have the buildings torn down, and it would interfere with the work of the Printing Office. The dust, etc., there would be a great nuisance while the building is being constructed. If a new building is constructed on the Mahone lot, when you get a portion of it constructed it can be made immediately available, as well as on the present site.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator be kind enough to answer me a question, if he pleases?

Mr. STEWART. I will answer it, if I can do so.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator give me his opinion as to how long it would take to put up a building for occupation on the Mahone lot, commencing from the foundation up?

Mr. STEWART. I think that it could be done much more expeditiously there than at any other place. It seems to me if there was business skill brought to bear upon it a sufficient building might be erected very speedily to receive the heavy machinery. That need not be delayed until the entire structure is erected. The trouble about the building down here is that the use of heavy machinery is liable to knock it all down at any time and probably create a great catastrophe.

Now, in an emergency like this it seems to me the Government might construct a sufficient building, or a portion of the building, where the heavy machinery can be put with expedition, much quicker on the Mahone lot than at any other place. Besides, the Mahone lot is cheaper when you take into consideration the quantity of land and the accommodations there. It is more suitable. There is room there for all time.

I believe it is the general opinion of those who have visited all these places, that the Mahone lot is the most desirable of all. I have been thoroughly convinced of that, not only by personal observation, but from observation of the debates that have taken place in the Senate, and I see no good reason to change my opinion. In point of cheapness, in point of sufficient land for accommodations for all time, and in point of expedition I believe the Mahone lot has a decided advantage over any other place which has been suggested.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER] in regard to the occupation of the old building while a building on the Mahone lot is being erected, I call the attention of the Senate to a letter of the Public Printer, which was read in the preceding debate, dated August 11, 1893, and addressed to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who is chairman of the Printing Committee. Mr. Palmer, the Public Printer, recommends the erection of a building which can be finished inside of six months, and which will give absolute relief to the present Printing Office and remove all danger to be apprehended from its present condition. In concluding the letter he says:

When a building shall be erected which will cover the whole of the proposed new site, the H street and North Capitol street wings (which are believed to be the only portions of the present structure which are unsafe) can then be torn down and rebuilt. The Government will then have a building which will be of sufficient capacity to meet its needs for many years to come.

The proposition we now make is to put up a building inside of six months which will give absolute security and remove the chance of disaster which is now threatening the employés in the present building. But if the Senate chooses to take the responsibility of keeping the employés there until a large structure can be put up elsewhere, then Senators must assume that responsibility for themselves. Here is a report of a public officer that the public printing building is insecure and dangerous. We know what has happened in this city within the immediate past, when lives were sacrificed and employés of the Government maimed by the insecurity of a public building which was occupied against all the laws and rules that should govern the preservation of human life.

We are asked now under personal solicitations to take this risk as to the public printing building, and to disregard the question whether those 3,000 people are to be kept in that insecure building in order to purchase ground elsewhere.

There is another consideration that I have never urged here, but which with me has some weight. Many of the employés of the Government Printing Office have their little homes around the present Printing Office site. They own them and occupy them, and they would be compelled to give them up or else be subjected to the inconvenience and expense of making their way each day to their work at a distance from where they live.

Again, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] argued against the lot which has been selected by the House of Representatives, immediately contiguous to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, because, he said, the locomotives running along that road would attract the attention of the employés, and the smoke and ashes and sparks would render the building not only uncomfortable, but dangerous. The Mahone lot has a branch of the Metropolitan Railroad running along its eastern line exactly as the main branch of the Baltimore and Ohio runs along the lot submitted to us by the House of Representatives. The very same argument applies to one as to the other. If we adopt the present site, the expenditure is very inconsiderable; the relief is immediate; all the mains for gas and water purposes are already available, and I say deliberately that in my judgment under present exigencies it is all we can do.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Missouri a question before he sits down?

Mr. VEST. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not remember the figures which were brought into the Senate in some former discussion, but if I am right in my recollection the present Public Printer stated, in connection with two other commissioners, that 150,000 square feet of ground would be required for this public building. Now he says in this letter that the amount of land which will be secured by the purchase he proposes, 54,000 square feet, will run it up to 115,246 square feet.

Then he proposes to add 12,533 square feet, covered by two alleys, one 30 feet wide, running east and west, and the other 14 feet wide, running from the 30-foot alley south to G street. That would make about 137,000 square feet. I have been under the impression that the reports heretofore have stated that not less than 150,000 square feet of ground would be enough for this public building. I understand the Public Printer now comes in and recommends a smaller amount of ground. I do not quite understand that, if it is a fact.

Mr. VEST. There was a statement of that sort, as I recollect, when the Public Printer, in connection with the Architect of the Capitol and the Secretary of the Treasury, made a report in favor of what is known as the baseball lot. But the Public Printer has since changed his opinion in regard to the matter, and he makes the recommendation contained in this letter, and is of the opinion that the quantity of land here stated is sufficient.

I wish to state, in reply to another suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina which I neglected to notice, in regard to the 40 feet upon the western portion of this proposed site, if the recommendation of the committee be adopted the 40 feet, if necessary, can be obtained at a very inconsiderable expense. The property there is not at all high priced, and $10,000, certainly not exceeding $12,000, would buy the additional 40 feet if it should be thought necessary to obtain it.

Another argument in favor of the present site is that there is an immense area of very cheap ground, relatively cheap, which can be obtained by the Government at any time.

I wish to state now, although I do not desire to violate any parliamentary rule at all, that, in my judgment, it is simply impossible to secure the assent of the coördinate branch of Congress to the purchase of the Mahone lot. They have deliberately put their judgment upon the lot which is immediately north of the Capitol and near the Baltimore and Ohio depot. The Mahone lot was fully discussed in the joint committee; it was visited twice by us; all the arguments were considered, and I will state frankly that with very great reluctance I gave up my opinion in favor of that lot as heretofore expressed. But the necessity for immediate relief and the necessity for economy in expenditure, in the present condition of the Treasury of the United States, outweighed with me every other consideration.

Mr. BUTLER. I understand the proposition of the Senator from Missouri is to patch up the old building.

Mr. VEST. The Senator from South Carolina is entirely mistaken. If he had done me the honor to read my report he would have seen there is nothing of that sort proposed.

Mr. HARRIS. May I ask the Senator from Missouri what lot it is the Public Printer recommends? The Senator refers to a letter from the Public Printer, but I did not hear it.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Tennessee will listen to the letter from the Public Printer he will see to what I have referred. I ask the Secretary to read it, although it has been read before.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., August 11, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of the 3d ultimo, suggesting that I ascertain if it is possible to secure an option upon sufficient property in the same block in which the present Government Printing Office is located to meet the requirements for additional rooms.

In reply I have to state that options have been secured, covering ground facing North Capitol and G streets, which, added to that already owned by the United States on G street, will equal the area of the present Government Printing Office site. This ground, comprising about 54,000 square feet, is shown by the blue tint on the accompanying drawing, and is offered, with all the improvements thereon, for the sum of $175,000.

The Architect of the Capitol estimates that to construct on this ground, to meet immediate necessities, a five-story building, 60 by 175 feet, fronting on North Capitol street, the floors to be of iron beams and brick arches, and the roofs supported by iron rafters, will cost $107,000; and for a six-story building, having the same ground dimensions, $126,000.

I respectfully recommend that this ground be purchased, and a six-story building, 60 by 175 feet, fronting on North Capitol street, be erected. Such a building will afford floor space equal to seven-eighths of that of the H street wing of the present building. This building, it is believed, will give immediate relief, and at a future time Congress can make an appropriation to erect a building on the remainder of the ground thus purchased.

Should this purchase be made, the total area of the Government Printing Office site will then be 115,246 square feet. There should be added to this 12,533 square feet, covered by two alleys, one 30 feet wide, running east and west, and the other 14 feet wide, running from the 30-foot alley south to G street. I would recommend that the latter alley be closed and added to the proposed building site. The other should remain open for a driveway and to supply necessary light and ventilation.

The act of August 30, 1890, appropriated $250,000 for a site for the Government Printing Office. I respectfully recommend that this appropriation be made available, with an additional appropriation of $51,000, to be made immediately available, for the purchase of the site and erection of the building referred to.

When a building shall be erected which will cover the whole of the proposed new site, the H street and North Capitol street wings (which are believed to be the only portions of the present structure which are unsafe) can then be torn down and rebuilt. The Government will then have a building which will be of sufficient capacity to meet its needs for many years to come.

Very respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

Hon. A. P. GORMAN,
Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I have understood that in the discussion of this measure it was alleged that the report of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds reflected the unanimous judgment of the committee. I rise to correct that impression. The report certainly is not in accordance with my judgment; it certainly is not in accordance with the judgment of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], nor with that of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]. I suppose it represents the opinion of the majority of the committee, and the majority only. In other words, it is not a unanimous report, although there were no views of the minority submitted.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, one of the few matters for personal congratulation in connection with the pending bill, so far as I am concerned, is that I do not feel the grave sense of responsibility which was imposed upon me when this matter has been up in its different forms heretofore. I am glad that so able an advocate of that which is best is now in charge of the bill; and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has not only my congratulations that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have assumed control of this matter, but I feel like extending to him at the same time a little of my sympathy, for he knows now how it is himself.

For the last ten years the danger to the occupants of the Public Printing Office building has been very great. The Committee on Printing, having in charge to some degree that great office, have repeatedly visited the building. They have recognized the presence of great danger, with probable loss of life. They have done what they could to put the building in safer condition. It has been propped up and supported and strengthened so that the great weight upon its floors might be maintained without crushing the lives and limbs of those who are employed in the building. These, however, have been but temporary makeshifts, and the building is, in my opinion, more dangerous than Ford's Theater was even after the excavation was under way which at last brought it tumbling about the heads of those who were in it. The Committee on Printing have always recognized this danger. In report after report from the Public Printer he has cried aloud for relief for those who were under his care.

I do not wish to delay action upon the bill by going into ancient history, but still I think it due the subject that I should say that no better action has been taken by any committee of either House upon this subject than that which was adopted by the commission organized years ago to select a site for a new Public Printing Office building. That commission was composed of the Public Printer, Mr. Palmer; the Secretary of the Treasury, then Mr. Windom, and the experienced Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Clark. It reported unanimously. One notable thing is that every report that has been made by other committees which have had this subject in charge has been unanimous, and there has not been a divided committee, such as now presents itself here upon this report.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I inquire of the Senator if he can explain, because I am asking for information, what produces the causes of danger in the present public building?

Mr. MANDERSON. It is because the building was never constructed for the purpose of carrying the great weight that is now imposed upon it. Its walls are not sufficient; its floors are not sufficient.

Mr. BUTLER. May I ask further whether that might not be obviated by removing the heavy weight to the ground floor?

Mr. MANDERSON. No; because there is not space enough on the ground floor to hold the different presses, and the vast accumulation of material, finished and partly finished, and the crude material that is there.

Mr. BUTLER. Then it would seem to be the part of wisdom to relieve the building of some of that enormous weight by renting some adjacent building and putting the weight off this building for the time being. I can see no earthly reason why the lives of the employés should be jeopardized when there is plenty of room in the neighborhood to relieve the building of that enormous pressure.

Mr. MANDERSON. That has been done repeatedly. Buildings outside have been rented, and rent has been paid for them, for the purpose of storing some of the material of the Public Printing Office.

Mr. President, the commission to which I have referred, entering upon the performance of its duty, selected from all the numerous sites that were offered that which stands to-day a vacant piece of property and the very best that can be used for a Public Printing Office, and that is what is known as the baseball lot. The report of the commission would undoubtedly have been acceptable to the Congress of the United States, and the public printing building would now be upon it had it not been for—I was about to say the indecent, and I do not know that the term is too severe—the almost disreputable fight that has been precipitated in the two Houses of Congress by the different real-estate speculators, who desire to make profit from this necessity of the Government.

The baseball lot is beyond question located better than any other for the purposes of the Printing Office. It is of proper form, being almost a square. I shall not go into the detail of the matter and show its dimensions, but it is ample as to area; it is near the Capitol; it is near the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, so that tracks could very easily be run into it.

In the effort that the Government should be compelled to purchase some other site there came those who were very desirous that great care should be exercised in looking out for the foundations of the new structure; and an attack was made upon the baseball lot. It was said that Tiber Creek ran through it; that it is filled ground to such an extent that no building of great dimensions and great weight can be placed upon it with safety. The Joint Committee on Printing took a great deal of testimony upon that question. It caused pits to be dug, to see just what is the character of the soil. The inspector of buildings of the District of Columbia, Mr. Entwisle; the Architect of the Capitol, Mr. Clark; the superintendent of construction of the new public Library building, Mr. Green, and Gen. Meigs, an architect of renown and great reputation, all, after thorough and careful examination, declared that the baseball lot is ample and sufficient to afford a solid and lasting foundation for this building. There were no two sides to that question, and yet, under the attack which desired that some other piece of property might be purchased, Congress turned aside from it and refused to ratify or act upon the report of this able commission that so faithfully did its duty.

When the time shall come for such an amendment I shall propose to amend the bill by substituting the baseball lot. I think perhaps I have given this subject as much, if not more, investigation and thought than any other man connected with it in any way, and in my opinion it stands beyond question, by reason of its location, its proximity to a railroad, and the character of the soil as the very best for the purposes of the Government.

Now, what is the second best? I believe it to be the Johnson lot. It is almost a square; is situated on the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio road, and is ground that is high and dry, and when you include the parking that can be used in part and the vacation of the alleys that run through it, it is ample, I think, for the purposes of a new Public Printing Office.

Mr. President, I have lost very largely desire for particular locality in my still greater desire that imminent danger shall be averted from these people and that we shall have a new building.

Mr. McMILLAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question there.

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does the Senator think that a building for the purpose of holding 3,000 employés should be made six stories high? Does he not think such a high building would endanger the lives of the employés? Would it not be better to buy land enough in which to spread the building over a great deal of ground, so that it would not of necessity be higher than three stories? Does not the Senator think that would be the safets plan?

Mr. MANDERSON. I think that with the improved methods in the construction of buildings, with the employment of structural iron that has come so largely into use, a six or eight story building is just as good, just as firm, as solid, and as secure, even for the purpose of carrying upon it great machinery, as a three-story building of the old style of construction.

Mr. McMILLAN. I was alluding more to danger from fire. It is well known that all printing establishments, as indeed all manufacturing establishments, are very inflammable. From the fifth or sixth story of a printing establishment in case of a fire it is almost impossible to get persons out, even in a small building, let alone an immense establishment such as this.

Mr. MANDERSON. I understand the proposition is that any building which is to be constructed is to be made fireproof or a slow-burning building. With the experience we have had in the great conflagrations I do not know whether any building can be said to be a fireproof building; but by the modern uses and appliances they are built of such a character that the combustion is so slow, that it is very easy by the necessary fire escapes, stairways, etc., to empty the employés from a six or even an eight story building.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Nebraska pardon me for an interruption?

Mr. MANDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Nebraska began his remarks; and I desire to ask him where the baseball lot is located and what are its dimensions.

Mr. MANDERSON. The baseball lot is almost at the foot of the hill. It is on North Capitol street. It is known as lot 678, and it contains 170,648 square feet, being almost a perfect square. It is two blocks this side of the present Printing Office and on this side of North Capitol street.

Mr. President, I was about to say that I have lost any pride of opinion as to where this public building shall be placed. If the Senate shall vote down the amendment that proposes the purchase of the baseball lot and shall vote down the amendment that proposes the purchase of the Johnson lot, then, believing that the third next best thing to do is to extend the Public Printing Office where it now stands, I shall vote for the proposition submitted by the majority of the members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator inform me as to the difference in cost between the three propositions to which he has just referred?

Mr. MANDERSON. I will state my recollection on that point. I may not be entirely accurate in my statement, because it has been some time since I looked this matter up and I have had to glance very hurriedly over some information before me to reach the result desired. The baseball lot, of one hundred and seventy thousand and six hundred odd feet, was offered to the Government—a contract was made by the commission to which I have referred—for $240,000. The Mahone lot, consisting of 137,000 square feet, was offered to the Government at $250,000, and I am not positive but that there was an additional $25,000 proposed to be appropriated for the purchase of this lot. If so, that would make it $275,000.

Mr. QUAY. That is the Mahone lot?

Mr. MANDERSON. The Mahone lot.

Mr. QUAY. It was offered I think at $1.17 a foot. I do not remember the exact figures.

Mr. MANDERSON. At probably about that. The Johnson lot that is proposed to be purchased contains 106,000 square feet, and it was offered at a dollar a square foot, or $106,000. The parking that might well be used permitted such an increase that nearly 150,000 square feet were available that could be purchased for the sum of $106,000. The additional land desired by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds adjacent to the present Printing Office can, I believe, be purchased for the sum of $175,000. So the prices for these different lots or localities range from $106,000 for the Johnson lot up to $250,000, if not more, for the Mahone lot.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the relative position of the Johnson lot to the present site of the Printing Office?

Mr. MANDERSON. The Johnson lot is farther removed than the baseball lot. It is probably three squares to the north and east of the present public printing building site.

Mr. CULLOM. On the east side of the Baltimore and Ohio road.

Mr. MANDERSON. It adjoins on the corner the Mahone lot. That is to say, the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio road runs along the east side of the Mahone lot and on the west side of the Johnson lot, the main line of the Baltimore and Ohio, which takes its course along Delaware avenue, being on the east side of the Johnson lot.

As to the Mahone lot, which is the lot proposed to be purchased by the pending amendment, I realize that when the lot, whatever may be its number or designation, is mentioned as the Mahone lot it is given a term that commends it to many members of the Senate. I do not wonder that it does. There is no man upon this floor who would go further to help the distinguished gentleman who is interested in that lot and who has given it his name than I would; and if I could bring myself to believe that it is for the best interests of the Government to buy that lot even at the price at which it is offered or more, I would be heartily glad to do it.

But I think there are such grave objections to that lot as should rule it out of consideration. In the first place, it is not as near to the Capitol as it should be, which objection probably applies to the Johnson lot as well; but I do not think that it is the proper shape for the use to which it is proposed to be put. It is 273 feet in width by 782 feet in length. Most of it is good ground and would afford a fair foundation. Through the lot, however, starting in, as I now recall the figures, from 20 to 30 feet from the corner on the one side and running across it and running out of the lot at a distance of nearly 200 feet from the corner on the opposite side is one of the main sewers of this city, and that part of the lot was filled. It may be that this lot has sufficient dimensions; that for present purposes it would not be necessary to utilize that part of the lot through which the sewer runs; but unquestionably as needs shall require, and as the country and the Public Printing Office shall grow, the whole of that lot will be needed for public building purposes.

Another objection that I have to the lot is that beyond a peradventure in the immediate future (and I am informed that if it had not been for the financial depression and trouble of the last year the fact already would have been accomplished), the Baltimore and Ohio road will combine its two branches, the one known as the Metropolitan branch, running along B street, I think, and the other, the main branch, running out Delaware avenue, and have an elevated road running into a new depot, perhaps located where the present one stands. The Mahone lot would, by that process, be cut off from its proximity to a railroad.

I have felt, Mr. President, as I have frequently expressed myself on this floor, that a true economy should require that the new Printing Office should be so situated that railroad tracks could run in and out of it, that the crude material should be carried in by rail, lessening the cost to the Government, and that the finished material which is to be distributed throughout the country by the medium of the mails should be placed upon the mail cars upon that ground, to a saving, as was estimated at one time by the Public Printer, as I recall it, of at least $150,000 per annum.

But to reach some conclusion here, to get some building secure, safe, and adequate for the purposes of the Government, I am ready to meet the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or the majority thereof; and if the baseball lot or the Johnson lot can not be purchased by the action of Congress, then I am ready to extend the present building. It is true that no railroad can be carried there, for I do not think Congress would submit for a moment to the crossing of North Capitol street by a railway track. It is not good economy; but the necessity is so great, and I think, too, that the proposition made a few days ago by the Senator from Missouri as to the present necessities and needs of the Government in a financial way are such, that we had better perhaps catch on to that which we have rather than embark upon any new enterprise. However, I shall certainly vote persistently and always against any proposition that proposes to foist upon the Government what is known as the Mahone lot for the abundant reasons I have suggested.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President, the necessity for making some provision for additional accommodations at the Government Printing Office has been perfectly well understood and recognized by this body. Eight years ago, I think, the matter was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, or brought to its attention, by the Committee on Printing, of which the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] was chairman. After a thorough examination by the Committee on Appropriations, with the full consent at that time, I understand, of the Committee on Printing, a provision was inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill for the purchase of ground adjoining the present site. Then, as now, the owners of squares and lots elsewhere, having no other consideration except the advancement of their personal interests, had sufficient power elsewhere to prevent such an amendment from becoming a part of the law of the land, this body, however, always inserting a provision for the purchase of property adjoining the present site.

Then came the contest which was so well described by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. Every owner of a square or lot who desired to sell it to the Government at a high price or a fair price came forward with a proposition. The result was the appointment of a commission, and finally the rejection of their report. Then came a resubmission of the question to the Committee on Printing, who finally recommended the Johnson lot. In that report, while concurring in the general view of the committee as between the different squares that were then presented, I stated that in my judgment—and I so stated to the Senate—the only business way to adjust the matter in the interest of the Government and in the interest of economy and with a view to the speedy relief of the people who are employed in the present old dilapidated building, is to acquire a sufficient quantity of ground adjoining it and put up a wing there, and then tear down the old H street side.

After six or eight years of examination of this question, looking at it and coming to a conclusion as I would in my own case if the property belonged to me, I assert, without the fear of contradiction, that there is not a business man in this body or out of it who, if he owned that property, equipped as it is now, would hesitate one moment as to the course he would pursue, and that would be to acquire a small slip of ground by the side of the present building, erect on it a structure of sufficient dimensions to transfer to it from the old building the operatives and the machinery, and the machinery would then be right by the side of the present engine which drives it all. The plan is to simply attach that machinery and go on with the work. That would be more economical and more speedy, and it is the only feasible way by which we can, within the next two years, relieve the people who are hived in that building at the peril of their lives. The acquirement of a new square and the construction of a new building involve an expenditure of $2,000,000 and three and a half years of time.

Mr. GEORGE. What would be the cost?

Mr. GORMAN. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars, and the expenditures to be made for a wing, which would at once relieve the congestion, would not exceed three or four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator from Maryland will permit me, I will state that the bill reported by the committee requires an appropriation of only $51,000 by utilizing or making available the $250,000 we have already appropriated for a site. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars of that $321,000 would be used for a site and the balance in the construction of a building which would relieve the present danger and discomfort.

Mr. GEORGE. How much of the old building can be utilized?

Mr. GORMAN. More than one half of it.

Mr. VEST. Yes, quite one-half of it.

Mr. GEORGE. Permanently?

Mr. GORMAN. Permanently. The portion of the building that fronts on H street was constructed by Mr. Cornelius Wendell, who had a contract for the public printing away back in the '50's. It was afterwards bought by the Government. We have added to it more than one-half of the present area of the building, which was constructed under the direction of the Architect of the Capitol. That portion of the building is good. A great part of it is fireproof and can be utilized.

Now, the Senate having three times, I remember, after mature deliberation, in the past eight years inserted in appropriation bills the provision for doing precisely what the bill now before us requires, the acquisition of this additional property, and in view of the late disaster which occurred at Ford's Theater, and having myself frequently made personal examination of this building, feeling for the past eight years that it is an outrage to keep those people in a place which is liable to fall down and where in case of a fire their lives would be absolutely in jeopardy, something should be done and done speedily.

I went again, after the Ford Theater disaster, to look at this matter, as it was my duty as chairman of the Committee on Printing, having succeeded the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. I then addressed a communication to the Public Printer, to ascertain what might be done to relieve those people; for the distress of mind was greater than Senators can imagine, compelled as they were for their daily support to go to work in a building where every man felt his life was in jeopardy and knew not whether he would reach his family at night. Every sensible man who examined it shared in that apprehension.

I say I addressed a communication to the Public Printer to ascertain what might be done to relieve them; what temporary arrangement could be made even to transfer them from the building and secure another, relying upon Congress to make an appropriation to meet such an expenditure, and also to see what could be done in the way of permanent relief. The Public Printer had expressed heretofore views as to the desirability of a new Government Printing Office building, a grand establishment, of fine proportions and architectural beauty. He looked forward, as was natural at that time, to acquiring a square where all the conditions could be utilized and such a building could be erected; but as a practical, sensible man, with a great responsibility upon him, with a perfect knowledge of the insecurity of the present building, with a desire to relieve those people at once, he modified his views, and said the only thing that can be done to give speedy relief is to acquire this property as proposed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GEORGE. How long would it take to erect a wing which would relieve the old building?

Mr. GORMAN. If you acquire the property proposed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, within a year and a half we can have the wing erected and the relief furnished. Then the old part, that is about to fall down, on H street, can be abandoned and torn down and a new structure built at the convenience of Congress.

Mr. President, I am thoroughly satisfied that no other provision can be made, as was so well stated by the Senator from Missouri when he addressed the Senate on a previous occasion, in the present condition of our finances. We know perfectly well that it will not be feasible to enter upon the construction of a building that is to cost $2,000,000 at this time. But there is a condition which confronts us and has confronted us, that is greater and more serious even than this, and that is the unseemly struggle of every man who has a lot for sale in the District who has been pressing Congress and preventing favorable action upon a measure of this importance simply because his interests were not subserved, each striking at the other and all uniting to prevent this relief, which ought to come speedily without regard to the desire of any man, no matter how high or how low he may be, who wants to make money out of the transaction. Both Halls of Congress have been plied with these people. It is not unnatural probably that they should do it; indeed I think it is the custom, and I do not object to it. They have been begging members of this body and the other to favor this project and that.

Mr. President, the time has come now to act; and I hope the Senate, and I trust Congress, in the interest of humanity, in the interest of the people who are compelled to labor daily in this great office, who can not afford to surrender their little places, will for once say to the people who desire to sell property, "This is no time to favor your interests." This is a measure agreed upon, after due consideration, by two great committees of this body, which rises above that consideration and becomes an act of humanity. Yes, sir; it is a public duty. In view of what has occurred and in view of what every Senator who has examined the question officially has stated to the Senate, there is nothing else to be done if you intend to give relief to these people.

As I said a moment ago, I united with the Committee on Printing when it was thought that the sense of the Senate was that a new lot should be taken, and I at that time dissented from such a purchase. So I repeat to the Senate as a Senator, as a member of the Committee on Printing, whose duty it is to inquire into the affairs of the Government Printing Office, the recommendation of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to acquire this slip adjoining the present site and upon that to erect an addition is the only feasible thing that can be done; and I assert again, and desire to impress upon the Senate the assertion, I venture that no man who owns a printing establishment in the United States, or who is engaged in a public enterprise of any sort, who had the matter as his own private affair, would hesitate for a moment about what should be done in the way of speedy relief, and to afford facilities for the next twenty-five or fifty years, and in view of the cost of the work.

All of those considerations point inevitably to the report made by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; and I therefore appeal to Senators to dispose of this matter as they would dispose of any personal private business enterprise, to dispose of it in the interest of the people who are now compelled to go into an unsafe building, and at the same time to give the Government an establishment which will answer its purposes for fifty years hence, and at a cost one third only of that which is proposed by the amendments which are presented to us.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, it is somewhat interesting to hear the reasons given for buying a piece of land near the present site. The argument of economy may be very good unless you strip it of the surrounding circumstances. Now, it is proposed to buy 52,000 feet at the present site of the Public Printing Office, and give how much for it? One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. You can buy the Mahone ground, four times as much, for $275,000; you can buy the baseball lot, nearly three times as much, for $240,000; you can buy the Duddington property for $200,000, or you can buy for $100,000 twice as much land as you get up at the old Printing Office.

I was sorry that the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds did not state that the other House were just as much opposed to the present site as they are opposed to these other sites. The plan seems to be to get the matter out of both Houses of Congress and into a conference committee, so that the lot near the Baltimore and Ohio depot can be purchased.

I think a question that was asked by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] is a very important one, whether it is wise to build a manufacturing building high in the air; whether it is not better to have a low building, or a number of low buildings, so far as the convenience and the comfort and the safety of the employés are concerned.

We do not want a building to cost two or three million dollars. There is not a manufacturer in the United States who would not go to work and within nine or twelve months, at a cost of three or four hundred thousand dollars, erect a building well adapted to do such business as is to be done in this building, and build it substantially, and build it in every way adapted to this kind of work.

I can only repeat what I said a few days ago, that before you can clear off the buildings surrounding the Public Printing Office, by purchase and by condemnation, you can take any one of these three or four large blocks of land and erect a building upon it to accommodate the employés of the Printing Office, where they will be in absolute safety, and where the entire cost of ground and building will not exceed the cost of the proposed addition at the present site if you value the Government Printing Office site on the same basis, which is $3 a foot.

If it is a question of economy, then buy one of these large lots; if it is a matter of convenience for the employés of this Government, take one of these large lots of ground; if you are looking forward to the future, then buy a large lot of ground where you will have an opportunity not only to erect a large building for to-day, but to erect large buildings for the future.

I acknowledge that there is a great deal of solicitation on the part of the persons who have ground to sell in this city. It is but natural that those who have large holdings of real estate should desire to unload it at fair prices, but it is not dishonorable at all for one who owns property to want to sell it; it is not dishonorable for a person who has property to offer it to the Government. The question for us to decide is what is best for the Government of the United States, which we are supposed to represent.

I wish to call attention in brief to what figures we have. The baseball lot will cost $240,000, containing 170,000 feet, which is said to be well adapted for this purpose. The Mahone lot contains 213,815 feet, which can be purchased for $1.17 per foot, and will cost $275,000. The Duddington lot, which has 211,000 feet, can be purchased at 97 cents a foot, and will cost $200,000. The block near the Baltimore and Ohio station, where only 99,400 feet can be obtained, will cost $300,000. A statement has already been made with reference to the land adjoining the present site of the Government Printing Office.

This is all I have to say. The few facts which I have stated should, I think, govern in the disposition of the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY].

Mr. CAREY. I understand the question is first on the amendment in reference to the Mahone lot, which I offered on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY]. Then my amendment will be next in order.

Mr. VEST. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wyoming on behalf of the Senator from Pennsylvania to purchase the Mahone lot.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. CAREY and Mr. DOLPH called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. QUAY (when Mr. CAMERON'S name was called). On this question my colleague [Mr CAMERON] is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. I do not know how he would vote on this question, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. McMILLAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. I should vote "yea" if I were not paired.

Mr. MILLS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]; but he told me when leaving the Chamber that he was in favor of the bill and against the pending amendment. I am also in favor of the bill, and a pair for the Senator from New Hampshire has been arranged with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL]. I vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. MORGAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PASCO (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER]. If he were present, I understand he would vote "yea." I should vote "nay."

Mr. PETTIGREW. I should like to know if the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from West Virginia has not voted.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I am informed by his colleague [Mr. PERKINS] that if present he would vote "yea." I therefore vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to announce a pair between the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. The Senator from Vermont, if present, would vote "nay" on this proposition, and the Senator from Idaho would vote "yea."

Mr. McMILLAN. I transfer the pair I have with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE] to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE], and vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY. I have arranged a pair between my colleague [Mr. JONES of Arkansas] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON], which will enable the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. McLAURIN] to vote, and my colleague will stand paired with the Senator from Rhode Island. If present, my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. HUNTON (after having voted in the negative). When my name was called I voted "nay." I have since noticed the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], with whom I have a general pair, and who, I am informed, would vote "yea," if present. I therefore desire to withdraw my vote.

Mr. POWER. Has the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Louisiana has not voted.

Mr. POWER. I am paired with that Senator, and withhold my vote.

Mr. WILSON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT], but I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL. Mr. President——

Mr. WILSON. I am informed that a pair with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] had been announced before I made my announcement. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CALL. I understood a pair was announced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. That being so, I shall vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will state that I announced, at the request of the Senator from Vermont, a pair between him and the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CALL. Then I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. VEST. I have not given myself any trouble about the matter, but I understood that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. COLQUITT] was paired with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. The Senator from Georgia spoke to me about the matter and told me to pair him, but on inquiry of his colleague [Mr. GORDON], he told me that the Senator from Georgia was paired with the Senator from Idaho. I have not been around myself to see the Senator.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will state that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] has a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH]. He did not leave any word when he went away as to his vote on this question. I was requested to pair him in favor of the Mahone amendment, and it was so arranged.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire very much that this matter may be understood. My action in announcing the pair between the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Idaho was simply at the request of the Senator from Vermont, who was taking his luncheon at the time, and who had been requested by some one on the floor, as he told me, to so pair him.

Mr. PROCTOR entered the Chamber.

Mr. HARRIS. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] is now in the Chamber, and he may be able to solve the difficulty.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to state in the hearing of the Senator from Vermont that I announced a pair, as requested by him, but it appears that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] had already been paired.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator from Idaho has a general pair with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. MANDERSON. So the Senator from Vermont is at liberty to vote.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I desire to change my vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. POWER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] to the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], so that I may vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. VEST. Has not a pair already been announced with the Senator from California?

Mr. POWER. I understand not.

Mr. VEST. I have paid no attention to the pairs on this matter, but I heard the Senator from Idaho [Mr. SHOUP] announce that he was paired with the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. STEWART. The Senator from Idaho announced that he and the Senator from California were on the same side, and consequently he would vote. He had been paired, but there is no pair on this vote. This leaves the Senator from California unpaired.

Mr. VEST. Who is authorized to announce that the Senator from California [Mr. WHITE] would vote in favor of the pending amendment?

Mr. DOLPH and others. His colleague.

Mr. VEST. There is something strange about this matter. The Senator from California, in conversation with me, stated that he was in favor of the bill.

Mr DOLPH. I would suggest that if the pairs be stated before the result is announced it may save trouble hereafter.

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 22; as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 832) to simplify the form of deeds of conveyances, trusts, and releases of land in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will also state to the Senate that there was a unanimous agreement entered into at a prior legislative day by which the bill the title of which will now be stated was to come up for consideration at 2 o'clock.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 341) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course I do not desire to interfere with the consent agreement, but I ask unanimous consent that I may now enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the Printing Office site bill was agreed to a few moments since.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment to the Printing Office bill was adopted. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is entered.

Mr. TELLER. I suppose the McGarrahan bill is now the unfinished business. I do not, however, wish to interfere with the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee, or any other motion.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill to which my motion relates has gone over, the morning hour having expired, and the Senator from Colorado has the right of way under the unanimous-consent rule obtained by him. I have therefore asked unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider, which may go over.

WILLIAM M'GARRAHAN.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 341) to submit to the Court of Private Land Claims, established by an act of Congress approved March 3, 1891, the title of William McGarrahan to the Rancho Panoche Grande, in the State of California, and for other purposes.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to say that I expect to address the Senate for a very few minutes on the McGarrahan bill when it is considered, but I was told this morning that it was necessary to bring up the bill reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in relation to the Public Printing House before the Senate, and I consented to that arrangement, with the expectation that the McGarrahan bill would go over until Monday. I have sent away my papers and some books to which I wish to refer, and so I am not prepared at this time to speak. I hope, therefore, the bill may go over until Monday next.

Mr. TELLER. I ask that the bill may be read. I presume the Senator will not object to that.

Mr. MORRILL. Not at all.

Mr. TELLER. Let the bill be read, and we shall get so far along with it at any rate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss this bill at length. It was considered by the Senate and discussed at length at the last session of Congress. I apprehend that it is to pass the Senate, but in my judgment it will be a case like that of the woman we read of in the Scriptures, who was heard by reason of her constant importunities.

I object to this bill, in the first place, because I do not think it wise to reopen cases which have been litigated in the courts and where the decisions have stood for years. It is quite possible that sometimes injustice is done to parties in litigation, but that can not be helped.

If, every time a party supposed he had not received justice, a case could be reopened and retried, there would never be an end of litigation; and if this were a controversy between private parties, and Congress had the power to reopen it, it would not be reopened. In my judgment it is only because relief is sought against the Government in this case that the reopening of the case, after the lapse of so many years, is favored.

If, however, the judgments and decisions which have heretofore been rendered in this matter are to be set aside and the case is to be retried, I do not think this is a proper bill for the purpose. The bill seems to me to have been drawn entirely in favor of the claimant and entirely against the United States. In the second section of the bill it is provided—

That upon the trial of questions or issues arising on the hearing of said petition herein provided for the said court shall receive as evidence on the part of the petitioner or the United States the original expediente presented by the said Gomez to the said Governor Manuel Micheltorena, and the diseño or map accompanying the same, or a copy thereof—

I do not know that there is any question about the authenticity of these documents, but it appears to me this language precludes the court from determining the question as to the authenticity of the papers presented. The section then provides that the court shall receive also—the depositions and other evidence produced before said Board of Land Commissioners, or copies thereof.

That, in my judgment, would admit depositions which were not legally taken, and to which there might have been objections before the Board of Land Commissioners. The bill does not say "depositions legally taken" or "depositions admitted in evidence," but it provides that all the depositions taken or produced before the Board of Land Commissioners are to be received, or copies thereof—

Then, it is provided that there shall be admitted—

All depositions, proofs, testimony, or affidavits taken before any circuit or district court of the United States in the State of California, or the clerks of such courts, or any commissioner appointed by said courts, or before any notary public, or before any committee of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States—

Ex parte affidavits taken before a notary public, if such are now in existence, taken at any time, anywhere, are, in my judgment, to be received by the court under this section. I do not think that is a just and proper means of determining questions of fact between individuals or between the Government and an individual. I do not think ex parte affidavits should be admitted to establish questions of fact in so important a case.

Then follows:

or of any map or deed of record of any Department of the Government of the United States, or of any act of Congress through which the boundaries set forth in said expediente and the title of said McGarrahan to the said lands can be shown, protected, and established, or of any oral or written testimony or deposition or copies thereof, concerning said record touching said grant from said Governor Manuel Micheltorena to said Vicente P. Gomez.

Mr. President, there are rules which govern the taking of evidence in the Court of Private Land Claims as well as in other courts of justice, and if we are to submit a question of fact to the Court of Private Land Claims, the parties should be required to produce their testimony in accordance with the rules of the court. Here appears to be an attempt to legislate into the court certain things as testimony which otherwise would not be testimony. I object to that provision of the bill.

Then, turning to the third section, there is another provision which I do not understand, which seems to be entirely in favor of the claimant and against the United States, where it is provided that the Secretary of the Interior, on a judgment being rendered to the effect that there was a grant made to this man Gomez, and that McGarrahan has succeeded to the grant, shall issue title—

For the land embraced within the aforesaid boundaries, as set forth in said expediente—

Now follows a provision which is very peculiar—and that the survey made by the United States surveyor-general of the State of California and approved by said surveyor-general on the 11th day of September, 1862, which survey was approved by the Secretary of the Interior December 29, 1862, and is now on file in the General Land Office, shall be considered as forming part of the lands embraced within said boundaries.

In the first place, it is a statement that the court is to determine the land embraced within the boundaries. Here is another provision which legislates into this case a survey made by the surveyor-general of California at the time of fixing the boundaries of the claim, and therefore that it shall constitute a part of the evidence, and the Government is precluded from disputing that survey and showing that it is erroneous or that it embraces more land than is embraced in that, but the claimant is not precluded. He may go on and show that the grant embraced other land not in that survey. That, in my judgment, is not a fair provision between the claimant and the United States, if this case is to be reopened and to be readjudicated.

Then, I object to the fourth section. In the first place, if after many years this case is to be reopened and this claimant is to be relieved from the adverse decisions which have heretofore been made upon his claim, what the Government has done under the decisions of the courts since they were made to the present time ought to stand, and where the Government has proceeded to treat these lands as public lands and to dispose of them under the laws of the United States, those titles ought to stand. If this claimant is relieved at all, it ought to be only in regard to the lands which have not been disposed of, as I say, under the adjudication between the claimant and the United States by previous adjudications. But what is provided here?

SEC. 4. That if the said court shall find and adjudge in favor of the said William McGarrahan as provided in section 3, the court shall proceed to find the value of such portion of land and minerals as may have been heretofore disposed of by the United States within the aforesaid boundaries, less the improvements, if any, made on said land.

Evidently this finding is to be had for the purpose of laying the foundation for an appropriation by Congress to reimburse this claimant for the value of the lands and minerals which have been disposed of. This inquiry is to be had between the claimant and the Government, and the parties who made the improvements and the parties to whom the land had been granted are not to be parties to and not to be bound by the adjudication. Then, apparently there is to be a double appraisement of the minerals, unless the appraisement of the minerals in the first portion of this section applies to the minerals still in the ground at the date of the appraisement.

And if the said court shall find and adjudge that the said William McGarrahan as the assignee of Vicente P. Gomez is or was entitled in law or equity to the minerals or other valuable substances on, in, or under said lands, the said court shall proceed to ascertain the value of such minerals or other valuable substances which may have been extracted from said lands by any person, persons, or corporations other than the said William McGarrahan, less the costs of mining and extracting the same. And the said court shall report the same to the Congress of the United States.

I object to this adjudication of the value of the minerals extracted, less the cost of extracting them, when the parties who know about the matter and who have extracted the minerals are not made parties to the litigation and when an inquiry is to be made simply between the claimant and the Government. I do not think that will result in a fair ascertainment by the court of the value of the minerals which have been extracted, less the cost of extracting them.

I repeat, that if the Government now, after so many years, is going to relieve the bar of the previous adjudication and is going to give this claimant a right to go into court and litigate this matter, his rights ought to be confined to the lands which have not been disposed of by the Government, and what the Government has done in the regular course of business in accordance with the adverse judgments against this claimant should stand and not be reopened, and the claimant should not be permitted to lay the foundation for a claim for damages for lands which have been sold by the Government after the adjudication that they were public lands.

As I said, I do not care to discuss this bill. I suppose it is going to pass. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate, but I am not going to vote for the bill. I do not see how a bill could have been drawn which would be more in favor of the claimant and more against the Government than this bill. I voted against it when it was heretofore considered in the Senate, and I shall vote against it now for the reasons stated.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I regret very much that the pending bill can not be proceeded with, but inasmuch as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] says he was misled by supposing, as we all did, that the Public Printing Office site bill would continue all the afternoon, I can not, of course, insist upon his proceeding at this time. I only wish that the bill shall be retained as the unfinished business for Monday at 2 o'clock, at which time the Senator from Vermont assures me he will be ready to proceed.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to offer two amendments which I shall submit to the bill. I ask that they be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. TELLER. With the understanding that the consideration of the bill shall be resumed as the unfinished business at 2 o'clock on Monday, I ask that it may be informally laid aside until that time, not losing any right it now has.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado that the pending bill be laid aside and be the unfinished business for Monday at 2 o'clock. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. Res. 144) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive at the subtreasury in the city of New York from R. T. Wilson & Co., or assigns, the money amounting to $6,740,000, to be paid to the Cherokee Nation, and to place the same to the credit of the Cherokee Nation; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate

CHEROKEE FUNDS.

Mr. HANSBROUGH obtained the floor.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me to have a joint resolution, that has just come over from the House of Representatives, laid before the Senate? It will take but a short time.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will yield if it does not lead to debate.

Mr. BERRY. It will take but a very short time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 144) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Treasury to receive at the subtreasury in the city of New York from R. T. Wilson & Co., or assigns, the money amounting to $6,740,000, to be paid to the Cherokee Nation, was read twice by its title.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate for the present consideration of the joint resolution which passed the House of Representatives to-day.

Mr. BUTLER. Unanimously.

Mr. BERRY. My colleague, who is chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, authorized me to state to the Senate that he desired to have it considered this afternoon, and that it is important that it shall be acted upon at once.

I will explain the purpose of the joint resolution if the Senate will permit me. We purchased the Cherokee Strip from the Cherokee Nation. We paid the Cherokees in certain bonds issued by the Nation, which were guaranteed by the Government. They were authorized to sell those bonds, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. They have made this sale, and have sold the bonds at a price which equals their full value. The Secretary of the Interior has approved the sale.

The transfer has been made. In the contract which the Cherokees made with the parties who purchased the bonds, Messrs. Wilson & Co., it was agreed that the money should be deposited in the subtreasury of the United States, to be paid out upon the order of the Cherokee Nation. The Secretary of the Treasury holds that he has no authority to receive into the subtreasury this money. Therefore, this joint resolution was prepared in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury with his full knowledge and consent. It simply authorizes him to receive the money in the subtreasury for the Cherokee Nation. Their contract is that it shall be paid into the subtreasury. That contract was made by the Nation. Of course they have no opportunity to go back and change the contract, because the Cherokee Council has adjourned. Besides that, they do not wish to deposit that sum of money in any private bank. It is such a large amount of money that they would be unwilling to risk it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to let me read the clause from the act of the Cherokee Council, January 6, 1894, providing for the deposit of this money in the subtreasury.

Mr. BERRY. Certainly.

Mr. CHANDLER. Section 4 of that act provides:

That the Cherokee delegation shall not receive the money or any portion thereof on account of said sale, transfer, and assignment, but the entire amount shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States, or any subtreasury thereof, to the credit of the Cherokee Nation, subject to the action of the national council.

Mr. BERRY. That is all there is of the joint resolution. It simply proposes to authorize the Treasury Department to receive the money. There can be no objection in any way whatever to the joint resolution, because the bonds are there, the Cherokee Nation were authorized to sell them, they have sold them, and they simply want to deposit the money in the subtreasury. The matter has been hanging for quite a while, and I ask that the joint resolution be considered now.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall be obliged to object to the consideration of the joint resolution at the present time and to ask to have it go to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I am afraid we would be ratifying a contract over which there is a controversy. I may be wrong about it, and I wish to be right.

Mr. BERRY. I wish to answer one proposition made by the Senator from South Dakota, if the Senate will allow me. There is no contract. There was another party who claimed to have a contract, but that has been disposed of in the courts. He brought it here and asked for the passage of a joint resolution, and it has been indefinitely postponed. There is no controversy about it, but of course, if the Senator from South Dakota objects, the joint resolution will have to go to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BUTLER. I appeal to the Senator from South Dakota to let the measure go through. I assure him there is no purpose whatever to take advantage of anybody by the joint resolution. The Cherokees have made the sale of the bonds, and they simply desire to have the money paid into the subtreasury of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury says he can not receive the money without this authority. That is all there is in it. The money, I understand, will be divided among the Cherokees themselves in ten days; and I submit to the Senator that it is rather harsh to interpose an objection and prevent the passage of a joint resolution.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I shall insist upon my objection; but I have no objection to the joint resolution lying upon the table, and not go to the committee, so that it may be taken up by unanimous consent, after I have looked into it.

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator will find that what has been stated is all there is in the joint resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I offer an amendment to come in at the end of the joint resolution, whenever it comes up again, or to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, if the joint resolution is referred to that committee. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. Add at the end of the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, however, That the United States shall in no event be liable to pay interest on the sum so received, or any part thereof.

Mr. BUTLER. There is no objection to that amendment, I understand.

Mr. BERRY. There is no objection whatever to that amendment. I do not think the joint resolution could be construed to mean that there is any such liability, but there is no objection to having the proviso added. Does the Senator from South Dakota insist upon his objection?

Mr. PETTIGREW. I insist upon my objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BERRY. Then I shall have to ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think that is necessary.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BERRY subsequently said: The joint resolution in regard to the Cherokee funds that came over from the other House was ordered to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask unanimous consent that that vote be reconsidered and that the joint resolution lie on the table until Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE RUSSIAN THISTLE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1545) to provide for the destruction and extermination of the noxious plant or weed known as Russian thistle or Russian cactus (technically, Salsola kali tragus.)

Mr. COCKRELL. I know how anxious the Senator from North Dakota is to have that bill considered. If he desires to submit any remarks upon it, I have no objection to its being taken up at this time, but the Senate is scarcely as full as it ought to be to consider such a bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will state to the Senator from Missouri, that the Senate is quite as full as it usually is when it considers matters of this kind. I do not desire to offer any extended remarks on the bill, but my colleague on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], I understand is desirous of offering some remarks. I shall content myself simply with asking that the report of the committee be read, which, in my judgment, contains a complete argument in favor of the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report of the committee.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. HANSBROUGH February 7, 1894:

The Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1237) entitled "A bill for the extermination and destruction of the obnoxious plant or weed known as the saltwort or Russian thistle or cactus," has had the same under consideration and begs leave to report a substitute therefor.

The majority of the committee agrees that the Russian thistle is a most dangerous menace to agriculture in this country; that the several States infested with it are unable to successfully cope with it alone, and that therefore it has become necessary for Congress to take action. Our conclusions are based wholly upon official reports now on file in the Department of Agriculture. These reports were the result of several official investigations made under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture.

In them we find that the Russian thistle was transplanted to the United States by Russian immigrants who came here under the provisions of our national immigration laws. The seed was brought from Russia about 1878 in some black daxseed which was sown, and the plant was first discovered to be growing upon our soil about 1880 in the southern portion of South Dakota. From there it has spread, according to official reports, over an area of 70,000 square miles, covering two-thirds of the grain-growing regions of South Dakota, almost one-third of the arable land of North Dakota, and it is to be found in many parts of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, and Wyoming.

The Department's reports show that the loss to agriculture on account of the ravages of Russian thistle during the year 1892 reached the sum of $2,000,000, and in the following year of 1893 the reports state that the aggregate losses reached nearly $5,000,000. Your committee, or a majority of it at least, agrees in the statement made to the honorable Secretary of Agriculture by Mr. Frederick V. Coville, chief of the division of botany, in which he says:

"The damage already done by the Russian thistle is without question slight in comparison with the damage which will be done by it if its progress is not soon checked. It is a weed peculiarly adapted to the great wheat-raising portions of the United States, and its advent is ominous of an overwhelming calamity to that region."

In another part of this report Botanist Coville says:

"A study of this question for the past two years by the Department of Agriculture shows conclusively that the progress of this weed can be stopped only by concerted action during the same season or seasons over the whole infected area. The facts at present in hand show also that the progress of the Russian thistle is rapid, and that if any determined action is to be taken against it, it may be done far more economically in the immediate future than after the expiration of a few years. It is undoubtedly true that if the progress of the weed is not stopped the damage caused by it in future years will annually reach $25,000,000."

The above statements on the part of the Department of Agriculture are fully borne out by unofficial information laid before the committee.

The question therefore presented is as to the method of dealing with this terrible pest and thus exterminating a most formidable enemy to the great industry of agriculture. For a time the committee was hopeful that the several States whose lands are infested might find themselves to be equal to the emergency, and would be able to spare the Federal Government the expensive task of dealing with it, but after thorough investigation we reached the conclusion that the States are unable to meet the emergency.

Furthermore, it would be necessary for the Legislatures of the several infested States to make necessary provisions for the work, but as these bodies do not meet until January, 1895, the danger of so great a delay, as pointed out by Department officials, must be readily apparent.

Again, the enormous expense attending a successful campaign against the Russian thistle can not be borne by some of the States owing to constitutional limitations upon extraordinary expenditures. We are also confronted with the improbability of getting the States, even if financially able, to adopt concerted measures, and act together, as would be absolutely necessary, in carrying on successful work to exterminate this pest.

We therefore conclude that the case, owing to its gravity and to the great expense necessary, demands the attention of Congress.

The Russian thistle is like no other pest which has in the past threatened the material interests of our institutions. The danger to agriculture from its ravages is now far greater than were the dangers to the live-stock interests of the country from pleuro-pneumonia in 1884. In that year Congress enacted a law establishing a Bureau of Animal Industry, making it a part of the Department of Agriculture and empowering the Department, through the Bureau, to make a campaign against the malignant disease then decimating our cattle herds. As a result pleuro-pneumonia has been completely extirpated in the United States. The expense of the work of extirpating pleuro-pneumonia has been twice as great as the amount now asked by your committee to exterminate the Russian thistle, but it is conceded by all that the expenditure was a most economical one.

If proper and concerted effort is made at once to check the thistle pest at every point wherever found, it is the opinion of your committee that within two years at most the dangers from it will be confined to small areas, and that hereafter the authorities of the respective States will be able to handle it.

Congress has made repeated appropriations of large sums of money and appointed numerous officials to deal with cholera, yellow fever, and other infectious diseases threatening the lives of our people. Congress has likewise gone to the relief of the unfortunate people in the Lower Mississippi country where floods have from time to time swept away the homes of our citizens. Then there was the pleuro-pneumonia act, under the provisions of which Government officials visited the stables and cowpens of private individuals independent of State law or State cooperation. And on one occasion the strong arm of the Federal power was invoked to deal with the seemingly harmless, yet dangerous, hoof-and-mouth disease in the States of Missouri and Kansas.

In view of the numerous precedents establishing it to be the duty of Congress to foster national interests, and in view of the present great danger to agriculture in several Western States, and the likelihood that the Russian thistle, if not stamped out, will ultimately spread to every part of the country, your committee respectfully urges immediate action upon the bill reported herewith.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, being a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, from which the pending bill comes, it is my duty to say that it does not receive the support of all the members of the committee. It does not receive my support. It is a very extraordinary bill, proposing to donate out of the Treasury of the United States $1,000,000 for the purpose, as it is said, of exterminating a noxious weed or thistle which prevails, as I learn from the Senator from North Dakota, in five States of the Union.

I also understand from him that this extraordinary application is made to Congress for $1,000,000 upon the ground that the five States in which the thistle is growing and spreading are unable financially to manage the question. In other words, Congress is asked to donate $1,000,000 because five States in the American Union are infested with a noxious weed which they are unable to exterminate, the cost being the sum of $200,000 per State.

Mr. President, the bill, so far as I know, is wholly unprecedented in the legislation of this country. It takes a step in the direction of paternalism longer than any step I have ever known. It has been supposed up to now that noxious weeds which interfere with the operation of farming were to be subdued by the farmer himself. Certainly, if this pest has got beyond the reach of the individual farmer, then I think the matter ought to have gone next to the municipality, to the county, or the township, or, if that were too small, to the State in which the pest exists. I know of no limit to appropriations from the Treasury of the United States, and I know of no subject which Congress can not draw within the jurisdiction of the taxing power if the bill can be passed.

Mr. HARRIS. What does the Senator from Mississippi say about the constitutionality of the proposed act?

Mr. GEORGE. There is a very large discretion allowed to the Congress in the appropriation of money. The practice of the Government for forty or fifty years has been in opposition to what I regard as the true construction of the Constitution of the United States upon that subject. It is too late now, I will state to the Senator from Tennessee, to reverse that practice. So I prefer to put my opposition to the bill upon the ground that it is a dangerous precedent; and it seems to me to be an unnecessary precedent. It seems to me that the claim of a State upon the National Treasury for aid, because it is being injured or ruined by a noxious weed which can be exterminated in that State for the sum of $200,000, is a very small one.

There might be, answering still further the question propounded sotto voce by the Senator from Tennessee, a case of such an overwhelming calamity, costing so much money, that it would be manifestly beyond the powers of a State to manage it, when possibly it would be proper for the Congress of the United States to interpose and disburse money out of the Treasury.

I am not aware, and no precedent has been cited, that Congress has ever undertaken to deal with a pest of this sort, to cut down weeds which are noxious to the farmer. It seems to me that if Congress goes into that sort of business we will find ourselves face to face with a very large and unlimited expenditure of money. In some portions of the Union there is a grass, called the Johnson grass, which many people think to be very noxious. It is said to be beyond the power of extermination, even if you furnish the money, unless you dig it up and carry it away.

Mr. HARRIS. Then you have to go 4 feet into the ground.

Mr. GEORGE. And, as suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, you have to go 4 feet into the ground. Then there is another grass, a great pest, which flourishes with very great vigor in the State of Louisiana and the State of Mississippi. I know of no pest which affects the farmer more than it does. It is called the cocoa grass. I know something about it. I have had a little of it on a farm which I myself own. I have made large expenditures of money for the purpose of eradicating it. I have put salt upon the ground for the purpose of killing the ground, so that it would not produce anything. That has been about the only successful method of dealing with it. So, if we are to go into the business of removing noxious weeds which may from time to time afflict our countrymen, I do not know that there will be any limit to the draft upon the United States Treasury.

One more thought, and I shall have said all I intend to say about this matter. I have alluded to the fact that the sum deemed necessary to effect this extermination, $1,000,000, and that is what is asked in the bill, divided among the five States, leaves only $200,000 as the necessary or the assumed necessary sum to be expended for the destruction of this pest in any particular State. I do not think that small sum justifies an expenditure on the part of the Congress of the United States from the general fund of the Union upon the ground of the inability of the local authorities to deal with it.

Then, sir, right in connection with that thought, I wish to state that there has been no showing, so far as I have heard, that the States have taken any steps toward exterminating the pest within their borders. Or, in other words, it seems to be a case of this sort, where five of the great States of the American Union have sat down quietly and allowed this pest to get a foothold within their borders, and, so far as I have heard, have taken no public step to rid themselves of the pest. If there have been any such efforts on the part of any of these States I have not heard of it. I can not affirm negatively that it has not been done, but I only state that so far as I know no such effort has been made.

I suppose I might say something, and probably ought to say something, about the defects in the bill if it is to be considered. I will point out what I regard as a very serious defect in the bill as an efficient and economical expenditure of public money. The method of exterminating the thistle as fixed in the bill is that the Secretary of Agriculture shall appoint one superintendent at a salary of $3 per diem and necessary expenses for each of said forty districts. The whole five States in which the thistle prevails are, I understand, to be divided into forty districts. Then there is to be a superintendent in each one of them at a salary of $3 a day, which means $120 a day for superintendents.

It seems to me, sir, that that is a very large expenditure of public money, and a very uneconomical expenditure. But the principal objection I make to that part of the bill is this: The superintendents, when appointed, are to make written contracts with the residents of said districts. If the Government of the United States is to spend $1,000,000 for the benefit of these States for the purpose of exterminating this thistle, this pest, it does seem to me that the provision of law ought to be that you shall get the best contract you can, that you shall get as much work done for the money as possible. Therefore, the bidding on the contract should not be confined to the residents of the several districts. It seems to me the world at large ought to be admitted.

But, then, there is another provision which really is incomprehensible to me, and to which I desire to call the special attention of the Senator from North Dakota. I do not know exactly what it means. It looks upon its face as if it were intended to secure, as a condition precedent to the expenditure of the money, the coöperation of the authorities of the States and Territories in which the money is to be expended. I am not sure it means that. That appears on its face possible, as the most probable meaning, but here is a defect about that. It does not state the extent to which the coöperation shall go.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. To what section of the bill does the Senator from Mississippi refer?

Mr. GEORGE. Section 2.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will state that section 2 of the pending measure is almost identical with a section in the pleuro-pneumonia act. It is in the identical language of a law now on the statute books passed in 1884.

Mr. GEORGE. That may be true. I am not disposed to dispute what the Senator says upon that subject, but we are trying the value of this particular coöperation. Will the Senator say to what amount coöperation shall extend? Shall there be $1 or $500 or $1,000 or $500,000 contributed? That is all indefinite.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Surely the Senator——

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to explain to the Senator the reason why the coöperation is required of the State in the pleuro-pneumonia act. By that act it was proposed to enter the stall and pen and upon the farm of farmers in the various States, to examine their cattle and kill them. Now, there was property. These cattle were owned. There was a property right in the cattle. It was doubted by some and denied by many—among the latter by myself—that Congress had the power to enter into a State, and, without the assent of the State, without the permission of the State, or without the permission of the owners of the cattle, go into the cattle stalls and into the pens belonging to the owners, and take private property and destroy it. That coöperation was put in the pleuro-pneumonia act in order to evade (I believe I would rather use that word instead of the word avoid) the constitutional objection that it was a State matter to take private property under the police powers of the State and destroy it for the public good.

The thistle, I believe in the theory of the Senator from North Dakota at least, is not property. It is an incumbrance of property. Nobody wants it. Everybody wants it destroyed. If that is to be the whole extent of the coöperation of the State, and I understand it to be to allow the United States to expend money in it, then I think it is a fatal objection to the bill. I regard it as a fatal objection to the bill that we shall go into the States and expend all this money among their own citizens without requiring the States to do one single thing to help it.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am sufficiently old-fashioned in my habits and ideas to have heretofore believed, as I believe to-day, that the taxing power of Congress was given for but one single purpose, and that is to enable Congress to raise the revenues necessary to meet the wants and necessities of the Federal Government. I maintain to-day, as I have maintained throughout my whole political life, and shall maintain to the end of it, that you have no more power to levy and collect taxes and appropriate the money to a purpose such as this than you have to levy and collect taxes and appropriate the money to build a shanty for John Jones or Sam Smith. I need not, however, waste time in arguing a constitutional question to this body, and I do not propose to do so. But set this precedent, appropriate $1,000,000 to exterminate a noxious weed in four or five States——

Mr. GEORGE. Five States.

Mr. HARRIS. Be it five, be it forty, I care not; the principle is the same——

Mr. GEORGE. Precisely.

Mr. HARRIS. And it is very much more noxious than the weed.

Now, set this precedent, appropriate $1,000,000 to this most absurd and unconstitutional purpose, and the next Congress will be asked for $1,000,000 to exterminate the cocoa grass, and later the Johnson grass; then I think I shall bring in a bill to exterminate the crab grass that infests the cotton fields of the South. Set the precedent, and where is it to end? We have a good many noxious weeds. The crab grass is a troublesome thing in the cotton fields of the South, and cotton is one of our greatest exports. I think I shall offer an amendment to the pending bill that at least one-half of the sum appropriated shall be expended in exterminating the crab grass in the cotton fields of the South. It is just as legitimate and it is just as necessary; and it may, perhaps, be considered more to the general interest of the country than the extermination of the thistle. But I need not prolong the debate. I merely wished to put on record briefly the views I entertain.

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, there is to my mind very little difference between the appropriation of money to build levees along the Mississippi River to protect the farming lands adjacent and an appropriation to exterminate the Russian thistle.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, I will state that I think that proposition just as unconstitutional and absurd as the one pending.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will stick to it and argue the matter from that standpoint hereafter.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Tennessee has stuck to it all his life up to this time, and the Senator from Oregon may rely upon it that he will do so in the future.

Mr. DOLPH. There is this difference between the two propositions. The Government is the owner of large tracts of public land. This thistle has overrun the Government land as well as the land of private individuals. The Government has a direct interest in exterminating the thistle to protect its own land and to prevent its destruction. The Government can hardly expect that individuals will not only exterminate the thistle from their own land, but will go upon Government lands to get rid of it. Still it will be necessary, if the noxious weed is to be exterminated, that that shall be done. So, as far as I can see, the only practical way in which this weed can be exterminated in the States where there are public lands is for the Government to take hold of it. For the reasons stated, I think this is a very much stronger case than many cases in which the Government has appropriated money for the protection of the public interest.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into a controversy with the constitutional lawyers on the other side of the Chamber upon a question which in my judgment has been definitely settled time and time again by Congress. I believe the question of Congressional action in cases of this kind was definitely settled when the pleuro-pneumonia act of 1884 was passed. I have examined the debate that took place over that piece of legislation and have examined the act itself very thoroughly; and I will state that the pending bill is drawn along the exact line of the pleuro-pneumonia act of 1884, and along the line of subsequent amendments to that act providing appropriations for carrying it out.

Mr. President, I wish to state briefly to the Senate what the act of 1884 provides. It gave the Commissioner of Agriculture, now the Secretary of Agriculture, the authority to send Federal officials into every stable, cow pasture, or into any other place where there were cattle, for the purpose of ascertaining the existence of pleuro-pneumonia. When it was ascertained that pleuro-pneumonia existed it was made the duty of these Federal officials there, upon the private premises of the individuals, to exterminate it. I claim further that the principle has been repeatedly settled by Congress in appropriations made to drive cholera and yellow fever from our shores.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from North Dakota allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. There is not a word of, or a line in, any one of the acts upon the subject to which the Senator now refers that goes further than to so regulate commerce with foreign nations and amongst the several States as to strip it of contagion. It is purely and wholly a regulation of foreign and interstate commerce, and no more nor less.

Mr. BUTLER. And a national question.

Mr. HARRIS. Purely.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. And so, Mr. President, I claim this to be.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator claim it is a regulation of commerce?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. A regulation of agriculture, which is a part of the commerce of this country. If you eliminate agriculture, commerce will not amount to much.

As I have stated, I do not propose to enter into the fine points of discussion with respect to the constitutional features of the proposed act. I am very sorry, however, that my amiable friend from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in his discussion of this question overlooked or forgot to refer to the repeated appropriations that have been made by Congress for the benefit of flood sufferers along the Mississippi River. It is unnecessary to enter into the details of that phase of the question. They have been fully discussed here.

Now, I wish to state concerning the Russian thistle that in my judgment it is a greater pest to agriculture than all of the other pests which we have had to deal with heretofore. It was brought here by Russian immigrants, who came to this country under the immigration laws passed by Congress. It was sown in seed that they put into the ground, upon lands that they took under our land laws, and it has spread over a very large part of more than five States. It is found in many parts of six States west of the Mississippi River and in the State of Wisconsin.

The report of the majority of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, which has been read at the desk by the Secretary, is predicated upon the official reports made by the Department of Agriculture itself, upon reports to the Secretary of Agriculture from agents sent out by the Department of Agriculture. In drawing the report I have not used any of the statements made in the newspapers or any unofficial reports, but have confined myself exclusively to the official reports now on file in the Department.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] seems to think that the sum of $1,000,000 is a very extravagant sum to appropriate for the extermination of this pest. It is stated in the official reports, to which I have referred, that unless the work of extermination begins at a very early date the expense of killing the thistle within a very few years from now will reach five or ten million dollars, because it is just as sure, if not dealt with summarily, to overrun every inch of the agricultural sections of this country where there are prairie lands as it is certain that the sun is to rise to-morrow. In the Western States within the last five years the thistle has been found to spread at the rate of 15 miles a year. It is driven by the winds from the north to the south and from the south back again, scattering the seeds until the ground is as thoroughly sown as if you had drilled the earth with a seeder. In many places in the West hundreds and thousands of acres have been abandoned by the farmers, who for the last few years have tried to cope with it and have failed.

Mr. President, the bill, it seems to me, is in the interest of the great institution of agriculture, and I hope and believe the Senate will reach the conclusion that in view of the very low prices now existing for the products of the farm and the inability of the farmer to incur unusual expense, and with the great prairie region beset with such pests as this is known to be, it is the duty of Congress to protect the great national industry of agriculture and make the appropriation proposed in the bill.

Mr. CALL. Mr. President, the bill presented by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] presents some very interesting questions. It seems to me that there is a great deal of splitting of hairs upon this subject without any real foundation. The Senator from Tennessee says you can not exercise the power of Congress for the extirpation of a great public evil that affects half a dozen States, unless it be a regulation of commerce. You can appropriate money to extirpate yellow fever, or cholera, or any other epidemic disease. Why? What connection has this thing with commerce more than any other cause that affects commerce indirectly?

Yellow fever is not commerce. Cholera is not commerce. If you are to be confined to the literal interpretation of the Constitution you can only touch yellow fever or cholera or any other epidemic disease, because they affect interstate commerce and because they touch interstate or foreign commerce. It is an indirect connection. There is no kind of question about it. That is the reason of the proposition. It is only because they indirectly affect commerce that Congress has a right to regulate them. Congress has no right to regulate yellow fever or cholera, abstractly, in themselves. Then where is the difference between those cases and this pest, affecting half a dozen States, destroying commerce directly, preventing commerce from having any kind of sustenance.

Now, if you can go outside the direct language of the Constitution and legislate in respect of something that touches commerce, international or State, that affects commerce injuriously or beneficially, and upon that ground can legislate in regard to it, where will you stop? The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] says that he will bring in an amendment here to prevent crab grass from growing. Would it not be equally pertinent to the bills he has introduced so often here appropriating money for the suppression of epidemic and contagious diseases? Would it not be equally appropriate to bring in an amendment to prevent the whooping cough or the scarlet fever? It is in the degree of importance that these things are to be considered logically and not by reference to a literal interpretation.

Now, in respect to the object and purposes of the Constitution, where will you find a difference between an invading army sweeping the whole country out of existence and a pestilence or a ruinous cause to agriculture beyond the means of individuals or States? I am informed by the Senator from North Dakota, who has considered the subject carefully, that here are seven States. They can not, by the Constitution, enter into a treaty or confederation. The constitutional measure is, that this is an evil beyond the competency, not the constitutional competency alone, but the actual capacity of these States to deal with.

Will it be said that it was never intended by the Constitution, it being admitted that a great public evil can arise which would destroy the entire agriculture of the country and which would require the co operation by treaty or legislative means of all the States, that that was not within the purview of the Constitution, that that agent which was prescribed to legislate for all the States and in reference to those things which affect all the States, could not deal with this great public evil sweeping over the whole country and entirely beyond the competency of an individual State, with this provision in the Constitution saying to the different States, you can not enter into a treaty or confederation with each other?

Now, that is the way I interpret that part of the Constitution, and it seems to me that we should now arrive at that ground where we interpret the Constitution according to its public purposes, according to the necessity of action by a common agent for all the States, and not by the literal language of the Constitution. In that respect the precedents, it seems to me, are entirely with the Senator from North Dakota.

As I said, I do not see the difference between the legislation for the appropriation of money to prevent the spread of epidemic and contagious disease, because incidentally it affects indirectly commerce, and the necessity of action here as to a something which directly affects all the States.

Now, Mr. President, I think that this is an evil that will be ascertained to be destructive to commerce and agriculture; that here is an introduction of a thistle, a destructive plant, spreading over the whole country with a rapidity which is impossible to arrest, except by simultaneous action in seven States at a particular period of the year. Is that true? Is it true that the agriculture of the great wheat-producing region of this country and the subsistence of the millions of American people who are dependent upon it is about to be destroyed, and the only remedy for it is simultaneous operation in all the different States of the means of destruction of it?

If it be true, and if it be also true that the great production of wheat is about to be destroyed, and the subsistence of millions of people, unless this remedy can be applied, and that it can not be applied by any one State, but that it must be done by some common authority extending over all of them, the States being prohibited by the Constitution from entering into treaties and confederations with each other, it seems to me that this is a case which ought to require the attention and action of Congress.

The Constitution is to be interpreted, in my opinion, by two great and preëminent considerations viz: To preserve the powers and autonomy of the National or Federal Government, and to preserve the powers and autonomy of the State governments. Whatever is not inconsistent with this is constitutional, if required by the public and general interest of the people.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to yield to me that I may make a request of the Senate.

Mr. BERRY. I will withdraw the motion for the present.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that the consideration of the pending bill be made the special order immediately succeeding the conclusion of the consideration of Senate bill 341, the McGarrahan claim, in the charge of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. QUAY. I suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that it would also be well, probably, to give precedence to the bill in relation to the printing house site. That is certainly a question which we ought to dispose of. I have no objection to the pending measure following upon the heels of that bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I do not understand that the Senator from Tennessee, who made the motion to reconsider the Printing Office bill, indicated when he desires to bring up that matter.

Mr. QUAY. My understanding is that the printing house site bill will come up in regular order as the unfinished business.

Mr. MANDERSON. My impression is that the unfinished business is the McGarrahan bill. That bill was not disposed of.

Mr. QUAY. No: neither was the printing house site bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Senate bill 341, known as the McGarrahan bill, is the unfinished bill at 2 o'clock on Monday next

Mr. FRYE. The Printing Office bill is then to be considered in the morning hour.

Mr. MANDERSON. It has no rights whatever.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I have simply asked that the Russian thistle bill be put down as a special order to succeed the consideration of the McGarrahan claim bill.

Mr. MANDERSON. That may be done.

Mr. WASHBURN. That is right.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask that it be made the unfinished business after Senate bill 341 is concluded.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to inquire what disposition was made of the bill which has been under discussion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota asked unanimous consent that it be considered as the unfinished business after the disposition of the McGarrahan bill, the bill of which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has charge, and it was agreed to.

PUBLIC LAND ENTRIES.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask that Order of Business 203, Senate bill 67, may be considered next in order after the bill of the Senator from North Dakota, the thistle bill, is disposed of.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MILLS. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the bill by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 67) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands, and to provide for the repayment of certain fees, purchase money, and commissions paid on void entries of public lands.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. TURPIE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. Then I give notice that immediately after the consideration of Senate bill 341, the McGarrahan bill, and the bill which has just been under consideration—the thistle bill—I shall move to take up Senate bill 67.

CAPT. JOHN W. PULLMAN.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill (S. 1637) for the relief of Capt. John W. Pullman.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senator from Minnesota if there is any particular reason why he desires to have the Senate consider that bill this evening? I had moved an executive session, and I simply yielded to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state to the Senator from Arkansas that it is a matter of some convenience to myself. It is a measure which I wish to have disposed of.

Mr. BERRY. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota, but after that I will renew my motion.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill; which was read, as follows:

Whereas John W. Pullman, who was commissioned a second lieutenant of the Eighth Cavalry, in the United States Army on the 15th day of June, 1862, and consequently commissioned a captain in the Quartermaster's Department; and

Whereas Hon. W. A. Day, on the 12th day of June, 1882, then the Second Auditor of the Treasury of the United States, prepared a revised statement of Capt. Pullman's account, finding due the said John W. Pullman the sum of $1,396.31, and on the same day certified the result to the Second Comptroller of the Treasury for payment, which was subsequently returned to the Second Auditor without any decision, and "without prejudice" by him, inasmuch as Attorney-General Miller had expressed an opinion that a previous receipt given by Capt. Pullman for an amount that the accounting officer had erroneously adjudged his due, estopped him from receiving the portion that had been erroneously and unlawfully previously withheld, supporting such opinion by the declaration that "had it happened through a mistake of law of the accounting officer of the United States the captain had been paid too much instead of too little, it would seem quite clear that the excess could not be recovered back:" Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, directed, on application being made by Capt. John W. Pullman, or his legal representatives, to adjust and pay his said claim as stated and certified to by the Second Auditor of the Treasury on the 12th day of June, 1882, in accordance with such certificate and the law applicable thereto as construed by the Supreme Court of the United States, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the

No quorum voting.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. BAILEY). The gentleman from Georgia will state it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The point of order is this, that under Rule VIII, unless a member is excused or necessarily prevented or personally interested, he must vote. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] was present and failed to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no rule of the House which prescribes a way of forcing him to do it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I make the point of order that it is his duty to vote, and I ask that he be brought before the bar of the House to state his reasons for not voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Under Rule IX, whenever the dignity of the House is involved, it is a question of the highest privilege. I make the point, sir, that the dignity of this House is at stake, and badly and seriously involved, from the fact that these gentlemen sitting on this floor are not voting. I therefore ask that they be brought to the bar of the House and made to vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the dignity of the House is in the keeping of the House, and that the House has not prescribed any rule for preserving it other than that which the Chair is attempting to enforce.

Mr. REED. And it is not a very large dignity, either.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then I desire to say that this rule stands on the same footing as the rule with reference to disorder on the floor of the House.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The roll call can not be interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is one point of order pending already.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am speaking to the point of order that I made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LIVINGSTON].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] was out of order on the floor of the House, and the Chair should order him to sit down and he should fail to do it, there is no rule of the House by which you could make him sit down; and yet you know you would do it, and it is often done and always done. There is no necessity for any further rule to make a man vote than you have already in this code of rules adopted by the House.

The language of the rule is that, unless a member is excused, or unless he is necessarily prevented, or unless he is personally interested, he shall vote. Now, Mr. Speaker, you do not want any other rule to enforce that rule. If you did, then it would be one rule after another, and we could never get to the end of it.

The point was made the other day, and the Chair held that while the roll call was in progress it could not be interrupted for the purpose of making the point. Therefore I could not raise the point at the precise time when the gentleman's name was called, under the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The permanent occupant of the chair also ruled that the point now raised by the gentleman from Georgia was not well taken.

Whatever might be the opinion of the present occupant of the chair as to the power of the House to prescribe a rule for ascertaining the presence of a member, or whatever might be his opinion as to the duty of the Chair if the House were proceeding without rules, is entirely irrelevant, because, in this instance, the House has adopted a code of rules which are as binding upon the Chair as they are upon the members, and which it is simply the Chair's duty to administer. The Chair can not add to them nor take from them. It is true that they provide that each member shall be present in the House unless excused or necessarily prevented and shall vote on each question unless personally or pecuniarly interested in it; but while the rules impose this duty on every member they do not authorize the Chair to compel its performance, and the Chair has no power to do so.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move a call of the House.

Mr. WAUGH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WAUGH. Division.

DWIGHT HALL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 574) for the relief of Dwight Hall.

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill, the House Committee on Claims having reported favorably a similar bill, which is now on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the claim made against the United States by Dwight Hall, of Wallingford, Conn., for the amount paid by him to the collector of internal revenue for the second district of Connecticut as taxes and penalties upon 30,000 cigars manufactured by him and previous to the payment of said tax or penalty claimed to have been destroyed by an accidental fire, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the said Dwight Hall, or his personal representatives, or the person or persons who may be lawfully entitled thereto, any sum of money found on such investigation to be equitably due on account of payment of said tax and penalty, or either of them, not to exceed the sum of $157.50, and the said sum when paid to be in full satisfaction and discharge of all claim as tax or penalty on said cigars.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. I will ask the gentleman whether a bill similar to this has been referred to a House committee and reported favorably?

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut. A similar bill has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Claims and is now on the House Calendar. The refund of this assessment has the approval of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. SAYERS. Will not the gentleman allow this bill to lie over until to-morrow that I may have an opportunity to examine it?

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut. It involves only $157.50. I ask that the report be read.

The Senate report (by Mr. PASCO) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 574) for the relief of Dwight Hall, have examined the case, and submit the following report thereon:

This case was before the committee during the Fifty-second Congress, and was favorably reported; a substitute was then reported for the bill referred to the committee and the present bill is the same as the substitute.

The merits of the case appear in the following extract from the report of the committee, during the last Congress:

"That the claimant, Dwight Hall, was a manufacturer of cigars on a small scale at Wallingford, State of Connecticut, in January, 1869; that he was assessed by the assessor of internal revenue on the January list for that year for 30,000 cigars. On the 9th of March, 1869, he paid the internal-revenue tax thereon of $150, with the penalty of $7.50 added, making a total of $157.50; that between the date of the assessment and the payment aforesaid his factory was burned and all his cigars were consumed in the fire.

"The collector of internal revenue for the district insisted that notwithstanding the destruction he was required to collect the internal-revenue tax. Hall accordingly made payment. He failed to make application to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for relief. For many years Hall has been seeking relief from Congress. The fact of the loss of the cigars in the fire seemed established to the satisfaction of the collector of internal revenue, who at the time expressed a favorable view of Hall's claim for relief.

"The proof shows Hall to be an old man, without business habits or training, nearly blind, and in great poverty; and while the committee do not find in the evidence Hall's reasons for failure to apply to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for relief, yet the statement is given by responsible parties who at the time were familiar with the circumstances that his failure so to do was fully and satisfactorily accounted for."

It appears that the exaction complained of amounted to $157.50, and it is recommended that the amount to be recovered be within that limit, and the committee recommend that the bill be amended by inserting after "them," in line 17, the following words, "not to exceed the sum of $157.50," and when thus amended the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that the amount involved is only $157.

Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut. That is all.

Mr. KILGORE. I would pretty near as soon pay that myself as give unanimous consent. [Laughter.]

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The House bill (H. R. 3154) for the same purpose was laid on the table.

HAWAIIAN BARK ARCTIC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 286) for the relief of the owners and crew of the Hawaiian bark Arctic.

Mr. O'NEIL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that that bill lie on the Speaker's table for the present, as a similar bill has been reported favorably by the House committee.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2857) to confirm to the heirs of Mrs. Courtney Ann Claiborne the title to a certain tract of land in the State of Louisiana.

Whereas under the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, "An act for final adjustment of private-land claims in the State of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes," and extended by an act of Congress approved March 2, 1867 entitled "An act to extend the provisions of an act entitled 'An act for final adjustment of private-land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes,'" the register and receiver of the land office at New Orleans, La., acting as commissioners under the acts aforesaid, have reported to the Commissioner of the General Land Office that there ought to be confirmed to the heirs of Mrs. Courtney Ann Claiborne, deceased, who holds, under Julian Paydras, a tract of land containing 530 acres, more or less, in the State of Louisiana, in the parish of West Feliciana, and described as follows, to wit: A certain tract of land situated in the Greensburg district, Louisiana, in the parish of West Feliciana, facing on the Mississippi River, left bank descending, it being the upper or western portion of section numbered 39, township 3 south, range 3 west, and containing 13 arpents front on river by 40 arpents in depth, or such a depth as said section hath: the whole tract of which this claim forms a part being known on the approved plat as claimed by Madam Maurain; and

Whereas it is proved that the tract now known on official plats as section numbered 39 was ceded to Julian Paydras by Don Guyosa de Lemos on the 23d day of January, 1798; and

Whereas Joseph T. Dandore and Guy Richard, executors of said Paydras, sold the said tract to Madames Maurain and Bonneau on the 18th day of March, 1825; and

Whereas by act of petition on the 30th day of April, 1834, Madames Bonneau and Maurain divided the tract between them, the former receiving as her portion 13 arpents front with all the depth from the upper or western side of the said section; and

Whereas Madam Bonneau did, by and through her executor, W. Charles Paydras, sell this tract to J. C. Van Winkle, on the 16th day of January, 1847; and

Whereas on the 11th day of December, 1855, the said Van Winkle did sell this said land to Mrs. Courtney Ann Claiborne: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the said tract of land, containing 520 arpents, more or less, situated in the parish of West Feliciana, on the Mississippi River, in the State of Louisiana, and as further described above, be, and the same is hereby, confirmed to the heirs, executors, or assigns of Mrs. Courtney Ann Claiborne; and that all the right, title, and the interest of the United States in and to the same be, and the same are hereby, granted and confirmed to said heirs, executors, or assigns.

Mr. BURROWS. How does this bill come before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] asks unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. BURROWS. Let the report be read, the right to object being reserved.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the report will be read.

The report of the Committee on Private Land Claims (by Mr. HUDSON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2857) to confirm to the heirs of Mrs. Courtney Ann Claiborne the title to a certain tract of land in the State of Louisiana, having considered it, respectfully report as follows:

This committee has twice reported favorably on this matter, viz, Report No. 1509, Fifty-first Congress, and Report No. 1938, Fifty-second Congress.

As the facts stated in these reports are entirely satisfactory to the committee, the report in the last Congress is adopted, as follows:

"The Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. 2717) to confirm to the heirs of Mrs. Courtney Ann Claiborne the title to a certain tract of land in the State of Louisiana, report as follows:

"The origin of the claim to which this bill relates is founded on a Spanish land grant to Julien Poydras, executed on the 23d day of January, 1798, by Don Guyoza de Lemos, brigadier of the royal armies, governor-general, etc., acting under the authority conferred upon him by the King of Spain.

"That the tract of land claimed is derived from complete Spanish survey and patent, and has ever since been held in uninterrupted title by the heirs and executors, or their assigns, of said Poydras. It is shown that this land is situated in the parish of West Feliciana, in the State of Louisiana, facing on the Mississippi River, on the left bank descending, and is the upper or western portion of section No. 39, T. 3 S., R. 3 W., and contains 13 arpents front on river by 40 arpents in depth, or such depth as said section 39 has, and that this section is situated in the Greensburg district of Louisiana. The claimant holds under the following claim of titles, all of which seem to be clear, properly executed, and complete, and certified copies of each of which are on file in the committee room, in the report of the Secretary of the Interior, by whom they were transmitted for confirmation.

"As has been stated above, the origin of the title is founded on a cession of this tract to Julien Poydras by Don Guyoza de Lemos, on the 23d day of January, 1798. It appears that on the 18th day of March, 1825, Joseph T. Bandore and Guy Richard, executors of said Poydras, by proper legal authority sold the said tract, which was the whole of section 39, to Mesdames Mourain and Bonneau.

"On the 30th of April, 1834, by an act of partition, Mesdames Bonneau and Mourain divided the land between them, the former receiving as her portion 13 arpents front, with all the depth of the section, from its upper or western side.

"That on the 16th of January, 1847, W. Charles Poydras, executor of Mrs. Bonneau, sold her interest to J. C. Van Winkle, and that on the 11th of December, 1855, J. C. Van Winkle sold to Mrs. F. L. Claiborne, the heirs of whom are the present owners.

"On the 14th of June, 1882, the Hon. H. M. TELLER, then Secretary of the Interior, acting under the authority of an act of Congress approved June 22, 1860, transmitted this case to this House for confirmation, in the following letter:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, Washington, June 14, 1882.

SIR: Pursuant to the requirement of the act of Congress approved June 22, 1860 (12 Stat., 85), I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, the report of the register and receiver of the United States land office at New Orleans, La., on the private land claim of Mrs. F. L. Claiborne, No. 18 of class 1.

They express the opinion that the claim is well established and should be confirmed. Their report is approved by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, whose letter of transmission is also submitted herewith.

Very respectfully,

H. M. TELLER, Secretary.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Your committee, therefore, expressing the opinion that the claim is just and equitable, report the bill favorably and recommend that it pass.

Mr. PICKLER. I should like to know whether there are any conflicting claims in this case.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. None whatever.

Mr. PICKLER. How much land is involved?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. About 500 arpents.

Mr. PICKLER. How much is that?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. A little less than 500 acres.

Mr. PICKLER. How does it happen that the register and receiver of the land office obtained jurisdiction in this matter?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. They obtained jurisdiction under the act of June 22, 1860, making provision that land claims in Louisiana and Florida under grants of the sovereignty that formerly possessed them should be submitted to a commission, which, so far as concerns the cases pending in Louisiana, was composed of the register and receiver of the land office at New Orleans.

This commission was required after investigation to report to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who, after examining the claims and becoming convinced of their justice, was to report them to the Secretary of the Interior, who under the law was required to transmit them to the House of Representatives for confirmation.

Mr. PICKLER. And there are no conflicting claims?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. None whatever. This claim originated in 1798 by a well-established Spanish grant, properly drawn and properly recorded.

Mr. PICKLER. Why do you need this legislation?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. For this reason: When Louisiana was purchased under the treaty of Paris, in 1803, there had been a disposal of the domain purchased by three different sovereignties—France, Spain, and England.

When Louisiana was acquired it became necessary, under the treaties with France, that something should be done by the United States looking to the confirmation or recognition of the titles to lands which had been transferred through grants by the nations I have mentioned. Congress passed several acts looking to that end, and in 1860—March 22 of that year—it passed this act, which provided a method of procedure in confirmation of these titles.

This has been done properly in this case. The register and receiver of the land office in New Orleans have taken action as a commission upon the subject and recommend the confirmation of the title, the Commissioner of the General Land Office recommends its confirmation, and the Secretary of the Interior has also made a similar recommendation in a letter transmitting the case to Congress.

A MEMBER. Who was the Secretary of the Interior at that time?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. It was done when Mr. TELLER was Secretary of the Interior.

Under the acts of Congress, and in pursuance of the treaties made at the time of the acquisition of this Territory of Louisiana, these lands were withdrawn from the public domain wherever there was a claim which had any semblance of being properly based on a grant from any one of the sovereignties having jurisdiction in the premises.

Mr. LOUD. Let me ask the gentleman if this matter has been reported by a committee and is placed upon the Calendar?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. It is a properly reported bill from the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. LOUD. And is it on the Private Calendar?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. It is.

Mr. LOUD. Then, Mr. Speaker, as this is private-bill day, I think it had better take its course with other bills of that character.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon that objection.

Mr. LOUD. I think it would be better if such measures should always take their regular course. We have been in session now about seven months and have not had a single day for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I would state further to the gentleman that this land has been in the undisputed possession of the parties deriving title from the original grantees, or their assigns, since 1798. It has been reported favorably three times from the Private Land Claims Committee of the House of Representatives. There are no conflicting claims; and I believe that the House should now grant this act of justice so long deferred.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE of Arkansas. Are the present owners of this land the heirs or descendants of the original grantees?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. They are the vendees of the original owners of the land. There is a complete chain of title from the original grantees down to the present time.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have read the statute upon which this matter is founded, in order that we may see the scope and object of this legislation. For the purpose of throwing light upon this matter I ask the Clerk to read from the United States Statutes at Large, volume 12, chapter 188, page 85.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the statute.

During the reading,

The SPEAKER said: Does the gentleman desire to have all the statute read?

Mr. BURROWS. Well, I would like to have a little more of it read.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent to have the balance printed.

Mr. BURROWS. I was having read the section under which this matter originated. There is only a page more, and perhaps it would be better to let the balance be printed. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. One request for unanimous consent is already pending. There can not be another at the same time.

Mr. BURROWS. Very well; let the Clerk go on with the reading.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I object to the reading of that any further.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. WISE. I do not object to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON], but I object to the reading of this long statute.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made to the further reading of the statute.

Mr. BURROWS. But the gentleman can not object to that. I asked that it be read, and the Chair stated "If there be no objection the Clerk will read."

The SPEAKER. But certainly the House is not bound to hear a very long statute read if it does not want to.

Mr. BURROWS. But the Chair stated "If there be no objection the provision to which the gentleman from Michigan alludes will be read."

The SPEAKER. The Chair assumed and supposes that the House assumed also, that it was a short statute——

Mr. BURROWS. It is a short statute.

The SPEAKER (continuing). And not several pages in a book.

Mr. BURROWS. It is only two pages.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the further reading of the book?

Mr. WISE. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BURROWS. Unless that can be read I shall object today.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] objects.

Subsequently,

Mr. BURROWS said: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that bill to which I objected ought to pass unless that statute is read to the House: but under the circumstances, I will withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws his objection. Is there further objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON].

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the word "acres" and insert the word "arpents."
Also, strike out the word "petition" and insert the word "partition."

The SPEAKER. These are two misprints in the bill. Without objection the amendments will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Should not the Reporters omit from the RECORD that long statute which was read, and should it not be referred to merely by the sections?

The SPEAKER. But it was read.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to omit the statute. It is not necessary to encumber the RECORD. It can simply be stated that it was read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to omit the statute from the RECORD. It requires unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. BURROWS. I have no objection to the request of the gentleman. I simply wished to call attention to the statute.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. RANDALL, indefinitely, on account of important business.

INSIGNIA OF THE RED CROSS.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5580) to protect the insignia and the name of the Red Cross.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which the Clerk will report, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection to its consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, on the 22d of August, 1864, at Geneva, Switzerland, plenipotentiaries repectively representing Italy, Baden, Belgium, Denmark, Spain, Portugal, France, Prussia, Saxony, and Wurtemburg, and the federal council of Switzerland agreed upon ten articles of a treaty or convention for the purpose of mitigating the evils inseparable from war; of suppressing the needless severity, and ameliorating the condition of soldiers wounded on the field of battle; and particularly providing, among other things in effect, that persons employed in hospitals, and in affording relief to the sick and wounded, and supplies for this purpose, shall be deemed neutral and entitled to protection; and that a distinctive and uniform flag shall be adopted for hospitals and ambulances and convoys of sick and wounded, and an arm badge for individuals neutralized; and

Whereas said treaty has been ratified by all of said nations, and by others subsequently, to the number of thirty-six or more, including the United States of America; and

Whereas article 7 of said treaty specifies the adoption and use of a special insignia, which shall be the distinctive sign of the Red Cross alone, under which insignia or sign the purpose of the treaty shall be carried into effect, the same being a red Greek cross on a white ground, and which shall constitute the military hospital flag of all the nations within the treaty and designate all persons serving under it, and the same is adopted and used throughout the world; and

Whereas the unauthorized use of said insignia in all countries within the treaty has become a source of embarrassment and serious injury to the military and naval sanitary service of the country in time of war; and

Whereas intricate and perplexing complications arise by the indiscriminate and unauthorized use of the Red Cross in calamities and catastrophies in time of peace; and

Whereas all nations most interested in the development of this treaty and its humane and provident work have already taken action to forbid the unauthorized use of its name and insignia; and

Whereas, from the international character of the treaty, it becomes necessary that there be in every nation within the treaty one body or organization in which the power to regulate the use and protect the rights of the insignia and name of the Red Cross shall vest, and that power is established by custom in every nation under the name and known as the central committee of that country, and through which body alone the international committee communicates with that government: Now, therefore, for the purpose of extending the same protection to this international and universal insignia in the United States of America that is extended to it by other nations,

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful, except as hereafter described, for any person or association of persons within the jurisdiction of the United States of America, to give, sell, distribute, or display the symbol of the Red Cross hereinbefore designated, or any colorable imitation of semblance thereof, or to assume or use as a trade-mark or as a designation or a part of a designation the words "Red Cross," or any expression liable to be mistaken therefor; that every one not directly connected with the American National Red Cross or without special permission granted by the central committee of the Red Cross is hereby forbidden and prohibited from wearing, using, or in any way displaying the sign of the Red Cross, hereinbefore described, or in anything liable to be mistakenf or such name and insignia, and every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished for each and every offense by a fine of not less than $50 or more than $500, or by imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; the fine so collected shall be paid to the American National Red Cross, to be used by it as it shall consider the best interests of said organization. All persons who have adopted or are using the Red Cross as a trade-mark shall, within one year after the passage of this act, discontinue the use of the same or be liable to a fine of not less than $50 or more than $500 and confiscation of said articles of whatever description, unless the central committee of the American National Red Cross gives them special written permission to do so, for which privilege a consideration of not less than $500 shall be paid to the said committee; all fines, confiscation of merchandise, etc., shall be turned over to the American National Red Cross, to be used as it considers appropriate. Any person or persons not directly connected or authorized by the American National Red Cross making or attempting to make collections of money or goods for or in the name of the Red Cross shall be liable to a fine of not less than five or more than one hundred dollars or imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year: Provided, however, That this section shall not be held to apply, first, to the officers or agents of the United States of America especially authorized by law to use the same and such officers and agents of the said organization as may be designated to aid in the work for which such organization was incorporated under the Government of the United States; and, second, to the agents of any Red Cross assbociation of any foreign state acting with the knowledge and consent of the government thereof and of the President of the United States first had and obtained: Provided, That this section shall not apply to secret organizations such as the Knights Templar, Masons, or the badge of the Sixth Corps of the Army, who adopted a red cross insignia prior to the 22d day of August, 1864.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] for the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there any amendment?

Mr. COGSWELL. No.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COGSWELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. PEARSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 913) for the relief of Louis L. Williams; and

A bill (H. R. 4013) to release and turn over to Mrs. Mary O. Augusta certain property in the District of Columbia.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1637) for the relief of Capt. John W. Pullman; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

COMMANDER F. W. DICKINS.

Mr. DE FOREST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5276) to authorize Commander F. W. Dickins, of the United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the cross of naval merit of the third class from the King of Spain.

Be it enacted, etc., That Commander F. W. Dickins, of the United States Navy, be, and is hereby, authorized to accept from the King of Spain, through the Queen Regent, the decoration of the cross of naval merit of the third class, in recognition of his services in representing the President of the United States, in charge of the courtesies to the Duke of Veragua, Christopher Columbus XIII, while he was the guest of the nation at the time of the late Columbian Exposition.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DE FOREST, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PATTERSON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

HAWAIIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the concurrent resolution of the Senate "to print for the use of Congress 6,000 copies of all papers and messages sent to Congress by the President since January 1, 1893, relating to the Hawaiian affairs," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
WILLIAM M. McKAIG,
CASE BRODERICK.
Conferees on the part of the House of Representatives.

A. P. GORMAN,
M. W. RANSOM,
CHARLES F. MANDERSON,
Conferees on the part of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the statement of the committee of conference.

The statement was read, as follows:

STATEMENT.

The Senate concurrent resolution provided that there be printed 6,000 copies of all papers and messages sent to Congress by the President since January 1, 1893, relating to Hawaiian affairs, the arranging and indexing to be done under direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations of Senate. The House amended said resolution by striking out "Committee on Foreign Affairs" and inserting "Secretary of State." The Senate disagreed to this House amendment. The conferees have agreed, and recommend that the House recede from its amendment and agree to the Senate resolution providing that the work be done under directions of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to have some explanation of the matter.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The statement which has just been read is as explicit as I could make it. The concurrent resolution of the Senate provided for the printing of these messages and directed that it be done under the direction and control of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. The House in considering the resolution struck out so much as provided that it should be done under the direction of that committee, and provided that it should be done under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The Senate would not agree to that amendment of the House, and the conferees met and learned that they already had the work done. It has been carefully prepared, as we are informed, by the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, and is ready to be printed. They are content with the matter as it has been arranged by that committee, and inasmuch as it was all ready for printing, the House conferees agreed that the House should recede from its amendment and permit the work to be done under the direction of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. How many copies are to be printed?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Six thousand.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. How many for the use of the House?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Four thousand copies for the use of the House. The resolution will show for itself. Two thousand for the use of the Senate and 4,000 for the House.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PATTERSON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker. [After a pause.] I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not yield, but can withdraw the demand.

Mr. PATTERSON. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to report back and request the recommitment of two bills to other committees. They were erroneously referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. This is a private bill, and will go through the box to the Committee on Claims.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4478) to provide for a telegraph system under the control of the Government.

Mr. WISE. This should go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of this bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DEATH OF LOUIS KOSSUTH.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House be requested to communicate the respectful sympathy of the House to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CUMMINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. PATTERSON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

MANCHESTER AND VERNON AND ROCKVILLE, CONN.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported favorably the bill (H. R. 4452) adding the towns of Manchester and Vernon, in the State of Connecticut, to the customs district of Hartford, Conn., and making the city of Rockville, Conn., a port of delivery; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HEARD also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (H. R. 4279) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

NEW STREET RAILWAY TICKETS.

Mr. HEARD also, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported back, with amendments, the bill (S. 443) to provide for the sale of new tickets by the street railway companies of the District of Columbia; which was referred to the House calendar, and, with the accompanying amendments, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The call of the committees having been completed,

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolutions which were pending yesterday in the case of O'Neill vs. Joy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] calls up the contested-election case of O'Neill vs. Joy. The Clerk will report the resolutions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Charles F. Joy was not elected a member of the House of Representatives to the Fifty-third Congress from the Eleventh Congressional district of Missouri, and is not entitled to the seat.

Resolved, That John J. O'Neill was elected a Representative to the Fifty-third Congress from the Eleventh Congressional district of Missouri, and that he is entitled to the seat.

Mr. WAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WAUGH] raises the question of consideration, so that the question is, Will the House proceed to consider the resolutions just read?

The question being taken, the Speaker declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BURROWS. I call for a division.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 1, not voting 190; as follows:

Mr. WILSON of Washington (when the name of Mr. DOOLITTLE was called). My colleague [Mr. DOOLITTLE] has been called to one of the Departments on important business. I ask that he be excused. He will return in a very short time.

There being no objection, Mr. DOOLITTLE was excused.

There being no objection, Mr. KIEFER was excused.

The call of absentees being concluded—

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and forty-eight members have answered to their names.

Mr. PATTERSON. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has submitted to me a telegram from the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] stating that he will be here on Monday next. He said to me before he left that he desired to argue this case on behalf of his colleague [Mr. JOY]; and in view of that fact, and in view of the fact that probably a quorum on our side could not be secured to-day, I give notice that this case of O'Neill vs. Joy is postponed until Tuesday morning next, when it will be called up by the committee and will be prosecuted to a final determination.

ELECTION CONTEST—WHATLEY VS. COBB.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to call up the contested-election case of Whatley vs. Cobb, from the Fifth Congressional district of Alabama. The report of the committee in this case is unanimous. It was prepared by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]; and the Republican membership of the committee offer no objection whatever to the disposition of the case at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolutions reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the contestant was not elected to the Fifty-third Congress and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That the contestee was duly and legally elected a member of the Fifty-third Congress from the Fifth district of the State of Alabama, and is entitled to his seat therein.

Mr. BROWN. I move the previous question on the adoption of these resolutions.

The previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof, the resolutions were adopted.

On motion of Mr. BROWN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. REILLY, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence until Wednesday next, on account of sickness in his family.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of general appropriation bills.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion of Mr. WILSON of Washington was rejected.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. O'NEIL in the chair), and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5894) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I now ask consent that the general debate may be considered as closed, and that the bill may be read by paragraphs for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BURROWS. I think that before general debate is dispensed with the gentleman should make a general explanation of the bill. Possibly there may be no desire to discuss it; but the matter ought to be properly understood.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Notwithstanding the fact, Mr. Chairman, that the cadets at the Military Academy have been increased some 10 per cent on account of the increase in the membership of this House, the Committee on Military Affairs have been fortunate in reducing the appropriations for the support of that Academy, making the total amount less than any bill which has been reported during the last eight or nine years, while at the same time doing ample justice to the essential requirements of that institution. The bill for 1890 carried an appropriation of $902,766.69; for 1891, $435,296.11; for 1892, $402,064.64; for 1893, $428,917.33; for 1894, $432,546.12; and the present bill carries an appropriation of $400,438.58. Notwithstanding this reduction the committee feel that they have placed enough in the bill to carry out the purpose for which the Academy was established.

It must be remembered that this bill provides for the repairs upon buildings and substantially for all that is required to support a post which has 1,350 people connected with it. It provides also for the payment of the salaries of the cadets, provides for the erection of public buildings, for the improvement of the sewerage, for the heating and lighting, and in fact all of the requisites for the maintenance of such an important and valuable institution as the Military Academy. I think that the closest scrutiny of this bill will fail to find any omission of what is absolutely required, and when the bill is examined the House will find that it has been reduced down to the very lowest point possible.

The committee with great regret struck out of the bill a great many items recommended by the Superintendent of the Academy as well as by the War Department. The total estimates submitted by the officers of the Academy were about $600,000, and they have been reduced about 33 per cent.

There are, Mr. Chairman, some people who contend that in a country like ours there is no necessity for a school of this character. I do not think that these gentlemen realize the conditions of the civilized nations of this earth at the present time. The best talent of the most cultivated and powerful nations of the world is now devoted to the perfection of military appliances and the development of military science. The object is to protect the honor and the property as well as to add to the glory of those nations. There is nothing that the people of a civilized country value as much as the glory and the honor of the nation to which they owe allegiance.

There is also a class of people who contend that the days of war are over; that we are to have in the future an era of perpetual peace. But they are not sustained in that assertion by the history of the past. From 1815 to 1854, a period of forty years of peace, the very same contentions were made in England and in other European countries, but when these many years of peace were impressing this idea most forcibly upon the world the cloud of war burst on the horizon of Europe.

The Crimean war involved England, France, Russia, and Turkey. This was followed by the campaign in Italy of 1859, in which Napoleon III sought to win laurels in the same field that his illustrious ancestor won his great renown sixty-three years before. This was followed by the war in Denmark in 1864; then came the war between Prussia and Austria in 1866; then came the Franco-Prussian war of 1870, and this was followed by the invasion of Turkey by Russia in 1877.

As Sir William Napier said, in closing the work upon the Peninsular war:

> War is the condition of this world. From man to the smallest insect all are at strife, and the glory of arms, which can not be obtained without the exercise of honor, fortitude, courage, obedience, modesty, and temperance, excites the brave man's patriotism and is a chastening corrective for the rich man's pride.

This same writer said:

> Yet it is no security for power. Napoleon, the greatest man of whom history makes mention—Napoleon, the most wonderful commander, the most sagacious politician, the most profound statesman—lost by arms Poland, Germany, Italy, Portugal, Spain, and France. Fortune, that name for the unknown combination of infinite power, was wanting to him, and without her aid the designs of man are as bubbles on a troubled ocean.

That was stated eighty years ago; but during that period the art of war has become an exact science. Fortune has ceased to be the ruling element in the conduct of such efforts and undertakings. Now the successful nation will be the one that establishes the highest order of military administration; and I contend, sir, that there is no money spent by this Government that is so well spent as that which trains a body of men to devote their lives, their intellects, and their powers to building up that system which alone can give a nation security in case of war. But it has been said, I repeat, that there can be no more war in this country. Mr. Chairman, people who make that assertion do not reflect upon the fact that nearly all wars have been brought about by circumstances by no means anticipated, circumstances which one would hardly believe could possibly have resulted in the carnage which eventually followed.

Again, nations are frequently compelled to engage in war in order to protect their commercial and their material interests. If we succeed, as I trust we shall, in extending the commerce of our country so as to compete with the interests of other great nations, it will be almost a miracle if we avoid such a conflict of interests as to cause collisions which so often result in war. We must assume that this will be one of the inevitable results of the extension of our commerce, which we all desire. If, then, war must come, let us be at all times prepared for it.

This should impress us with the importance of being always prepared for such emergencies, and the first important step in preparations of this character is to prepare a corps of thoroughly educated and accomplished officers.

In his message to Congress in 1796, Washington said:

> Whatever arguments may be drawn from particular examples superficially viewed, a thorough examination of the subjects will evince that the art of war is both comprehensive and complicated, that it demands much previous study, and that the possession of it, in its most improved and perfect state, is always of great moment to the security of a nation.

The great Napoleon also said:

> The knowledge of grand tactics is acquired only by experience and by the study of the history of the campaigns of all the great captains. Gustavus Adolphus, Turenne, Frederick, like Alexander, Hannibal, and Cæsar, have all acted on the same principles of holding their forces united, being nowhere vulnerable, and throwing their masses upon important points; such are the principles which insure victory. Read again and again the campaigns of Alexander, Hannibal, Gustavus, Turenne, Eugene, and of Frederick. Make them your models. This is the only way of becoming a great captain and mastering the secrets of the art of war. Your genius, enlightened by this study, will induce you to reject all maxims in conflict with those of these great commanders.

These expressions from Washington, the greatest patriot, and Napoleon, the greatest warrior, should certainly receive the most careful consideration of the lawmakers of the great people we represent.

I do not hesitate to assert that the Academic Board at West Point have brought the system of discipline, administration, and instruction to as near perfection as can possibly be done by human efforts.

These eminent gentlemen seem to have the one absorbing ambition to bring the Academy to a degree of excellence superior to that of any like institution in the world, and I think they have accomplished it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, unless some gentleman wishes information about some part of this bill, or unless some gentleman wishes to discuss it, I shall ask that general debate be closed, and that we proceed to read the bill by paragraphs.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed, and that we now proceed to read the bill by paragraphs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill by paragraphs, read as follows:

> For one commandant of cadets (lieutenant-colonel), in addition to pay as captain, $1,200.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move to strike out the last word. I was called out for a moment. I intended to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], before he concluded his remarks, some questions about the bill. I notice that the estimates for the Military Academy were $599,000; that the Secretary of War, after carefully scrutinizing the estimates, reduced them to $465,000, and that the bill carries only $400,000. I desire to know in what items the reduction of $65,000 from the estimates of the Secretary of War have been made?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We wrote to the officers of the Academy making very minute inquiries, and we finally asked to have the Superintendent appear before the committee. The bill was thoroughly gone over with him, and the information thus obtained enabled us to omit many items and also to make numerous reductions. The item for "repairs and improvements," on page 4 of the bill, we reduced from $18,000 to $16,000; the item for "extra pay for twenty-eight enlisted men," on page 6 of the bill, we reduced from $840 to $280; the item in line 9, page 7, we reduced from $1,000 to $800, and in line 12 we reduced from $450 to $300. We struck out the estimate of $3,000 to purchase "Driggs-Schroeder" gun. The item for repairs to "chapel," page 16, line 1, we reduced from $3,900 to $1,500; the item on lines 12 and 13 we reduced from $500 to $250. The item for "repairing roads," in lines 18 and 19, are reduced from $1,000 to $500. On page 17, lines 18 and 19, we reduced the appropriation for "broken stone and gravel" for roads from $2,000 to $1,500, and the appropriation for improving the "Post Cemetery," lines 20, 21, and 22, we reduced from $1,500 to $1,000. We omitted altogether an estimate of $2,500 for "building a set of hospital stewards' quarters." On page 21, lines 11 and 12, we reduced the appropriation from $400 to $200, and the items for "painting quarters," in lines 18, 19, and 20, we reduced from $1,200 to $1,000. We omitted an item for "repairing boat house," which amounted to $900; we also omitted an item of $1,000 for "fittings for ordnance museum;" we also omitted an estimate of $4,200 for a "porch to the new cavalry barracks." On page 22, lines 5 and 6, for "general repairs to cavalry stables" we reduced from $2,460 to $1,000. Lines 8 and 9, same page, for "wall on east side of road from north gate" we reduced from $1,800 to $1,000. The item for "reflooring band barracks," amounting to $2,400, we struck out altogether. The item for "reflooring barracks," lines 24 and 25, we reduced from $1,200 to $1,000. Page 23, we reduced the item for "gas pipes," in lines 5 and 6, from $400 to $300.

The estimate of $4,500 for "steam road roller for repairing roads" we struck out altogether. We also found, as the Academy was not full and could not be filled to the quota authorized by law, we made a reduction in the appropriation for the "pay of cadets." After the most careful investigation the committee found these reductions and omissions could be made without any serious injury to the Academy.

Mr. DINGLEY. Then the reduction was chiefly made by the omission of permanent works connected with the Academy?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. By omissions and some slight reductions in a great many different items.

Mr. DINGLEY. Were there any permanent objects appropriated for in the bill for the present fiscal year?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Most of the appropriations which come under the head of permanent works are repairs and improvements; also in increasing the water supply and in completing the sewerage.

Mr. DINGLEY. Four hundred and thirty-two thousand dollars is the bill for this year.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; we have $25,000 in this bill for the improvement of the waterworks. That is a permanent work. Then we have appropriated $3,000 for the continuation of a road to the south, which appropriation was made necessary from the fact that we purchased what is called the Kinsley estate. Prior to the purchase that road was kept up by the county. After its purchase we were compelled to keep it up. We appropriated $3,000 to macadamize it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The difference between this bill and the bill of last year can be made up by one item alone. That is an appropriation which was made last year for a new gas plant. There is no want of sufficient funds for conducting the Academy properly, and the improvements that are absolutely necessary are well provided for.

Mr. DINGLEY. The reduction is made simply by the omission of all appropriations for permanent objects?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Not all, but many.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman that the committee sought as far as possible to make no reductions in items that pertained particularly to the Academy. They took this view, that the barracks, the Academy building, and the mess hall constitute the Academy. Then we have soldiers, as I have stated, and their families, so that the total number of men with their families amounts to 1,350 persons, men, women, and children, and they all have to be provided for; but we felt that there were items recommended for appropriation to benefit their condition that could be properly omitted or go over for a year.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of eight assistant professors (captains), in addition to pay as first lieutenants, $4,000, and hereafter no graduate of the Military Academy shall be assigned or detailed to serve at said Academy as a professor, instructor, or assistant to either within two years after his graduation, and so much of the act of June 30, 1882, as is in conflict with this provision is hereby repealed.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], a member of the committee, desires to make a point of order to this clause. He is not present, but expects to be here before the determination of the bill is reached, and I would suggest that with the point of order reserved that paragraph be passed over.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to passing over the paragraph without prejudice, as requested by the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of one scavenger at $60 a month, $720.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I move to strike out lines 10 and 11, on page 15, for the purpose of obtaining some explanation on the part of the committee of the creation of this new employé.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman from Louisiana that the estimates tell us this in a note.

The services of a scavenger are deemed necessary in keeping in a proper sanitary condition the many earth closets, some 50 in number, in use here for the families of married enlisted men. The present manner of caring for these closets, that is by the detail of an enlisted man for the purpose, is unsatisfactory and objectionable, and it is deemed best for the interests of all concerned that the services of a civilian be secured.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a growing feeling among army officers that we ought to enlist the best class of men possible for the rank and file of the Army; and in order to succeed in that laudable purpose of elevating the rank and file the officials are doing all they can to prevent the evil which has existed to some extent for many years of requiring soldiers to do improper and unmilitary work. Ordinary laboring men can be employed for such menial labor at a less price than it would cost to maintain a soldier. We can not enlist the best class of men unless it is understood that such menial duties shall not be required of them; and therefore this is done in the line of improving the military administration of the Army.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For reflooring cadet mess hall, 96 feet long by 45 feet wide, substituting for the old and double-board floor therein a stone, slate, or tile floor, whichever may be best attainable under this appropriation, $4,000, to be immediately available.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I ask the gentleman in charge of the bill what is the necessity for expending $4,000 in putting in a floor in this mess hall, which is only 96 feet long by 45 feet wide. Four thousand dollars seems to be an extravagant price to pay for a floor of that size.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will state to the gentleman that it is necessary to have the floor washed every day.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That paragraph is on page 18, lines 11 to 16, inclusive.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is deemed necessary to have an appropriation of $4,000 for putting a stone or tile floor in the mess hall, and the reason is that the wooden floor, being washed with soap, as it is being done daily, causes such a disagreeable odor that it is very desirable to have a stone or tile floor.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is not necessary to clean it with soap. You can do it with a dry mop and wheat bran.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Let me inform the gentleman from Georgia that frequently it is muddy, snowy, and sloppy, and when three hundred cadets have to be marched in ranks through this slop and mud and go into this hall three times a day, the floor will necessarily become soiled and require frequent cleaning.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is there not a gravel walk over which they walk to this hall?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The walk from the barracks to the mess hall is partly gravel, but a portion of the walk is of a character that becomes very muddy in wet weather, and in the spring, when the ground is thawing, the walk becomes very soft and muddy. During the summer the walk from the camp to the mess hall is always muddy after a heavy rain.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman the plain question, taking it for granted that it is sloppy there at times, why do you want $4,000 for flooring so small a hall?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Because an investigation shows that it can not be done for less. I will read from the estimates on this subject:

Some years ago a new board floor was laid in the hall on top of the then floor. The hall has, therefore, a double wooden floor, each of which is old and very inferior. Owing to the use of the hall thrice daily, the scrubbing of the hall daily or oftener is absolutely necessary. This double floor absorbs the soapy water, which afterwards evaporates, filling the hall constantly with a foul odor which is sickening, but which with the present floor can not be avoided, as it will be with a stone, slate, or tile floor.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There are millions of the best families in this country living and sleeping on wooden floors.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They do, sir; but in going into the house they mop their feet.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why can not these boys do that?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Because these boys could not spend the time in doing so. Suppose that these three hundred boys have each to wipe their shoes on mops at least three times a day, as they are being marched into this hall, it would take not less than half an hour each time and that half hour can not be spared, because from 5 o'clock in the morning until 10 o'clock at night these cadets are either being drilled, studying, or engaged in recitation.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that they have time to play football.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. They do have a little time for exercise. I was going to say they have half an hour at breakfast, half an hour at dinner, and half an hour or possibly a little longer in the evening, but all the rest of the time they are very busy.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not propose to discuss the sanitary condition of that building.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am showing you that they can not have time to stop at the mess hall door half an hour at breakfast time, half an hour at dinner time, and half an hour at supper time to rub their shoes upon mats before they go into the hall. Soldiers never do that. Soldiers are different from other people. The soldiers in the Federal army and the Confederate army during the war did not clean their feet three or four times a day. [Laughter.]

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I do not propose to make the boys clean their feet. If they can not be made to do it at the institution, I do not believe we here can make them do it; but I want to ask the gentleman whether it is absolutely necessary to have $4,000 for this purpose. I will state to him that my own judgment is that half the money will put a floor there of slate.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will state to the gentleman that an appropriation for this purpose has been recommended now for four or five years. We have put it off from time to time. We have had estimate after estimate made, and we believe that it can not be done for less than this amount, and therefore the committee, who have scrutinized all these items with the greatest care, and with the aid of the Secretary of War have reduced the appropriations from $600,000 to $400,000, believe that this is essential, and have recommended that it be appropriated by the House.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the gentleman, as a member of this House, mean to tell me that if the contract is let out to the world, at open bidding, this floor can not be laid for less than $4,000?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will state to the gentleman that it will be let openly to the world, and if the work can be done for one cent less than $4,000 the balance of the money will go back into the Treasury.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Oh, it is easy enough to get the contract up to the amount of the appropriation bill.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I assure the gentleman that the officers there are men who do not trifle with the Government. They try to get everything done as cheaply as possible. Nothing is done by them that is not in accordance with the strictest integrity and it would be a violation of integrity for them to pay more than is necessary to get this work done.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I did not refer in my remark to your officers, but to the people who would do the work. It is very easy for them to find out that there is an appropriation of $4,000, and to combine to make a bid for not less than that amount.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Oh, the whole of the people of this country can not combine.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, people do combine. The ice men in this city have combined and put up the price of ice on the Departments 49 per cent.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. That may be done in a city, but it can not be done all over this country. The bidding will be open not only to the 70,000,000 people of this country, but to the whole world.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Well, if it is to be prevented it must be prevented by God Almighty. You and I can not do it.

The Clerk read as follows:

For painting, and for general incidental repairs and improvements to the cadet quartermaster's department building, including storerooms, office, tailor shops, shoe repairing, etc., the same to be expended as required without advertising, $300.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama whether he has given this committee any detailed information as to the omissions of which he speaks in his report. In the report he says:

The committee have stricken out many items which were regarded as very important, but by careful investigation it was found that a delay of a year would not be attended with any serious results.

Has the gentleman given any explanation as to those important items?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. One item was $4,500 for a steam roller; another was an item of $3,000 for a new gun, which they want very much for the purpose of instructing the cadets, but on consulting with the Superintendent he said they could get along without it for another year without serious inconvenience. There are a number of other items which I have already enumerated. There is also omitted an item of $35,000 which the Superintendent asked to have appropriated for a tower to the new academic building. The reason we struck that out was this: I wrote to the Superintendent and asked him whether it would cost any more to do that work after the building was completed, and he investigated and found that it would not. There is also omitted $50,000 for repairing the library. Plans were submitted by the Superintendent to make the library fireproof, and I think it is very essential that that should be done at an early day.

Mr. REED. But in the mean time, owing to the poverty of the country, you propose to take the risk of having the books burned?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We have determined, with regret, to let the matter run for another year unless the gentleman from Maine chooses to move to add $50,000 for that purpose. If he offers that amendment and the House votes it we will begin the work immediately. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Then, Mr. Chairman, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama, I will make that motion if he will be kind enough to word the amendment for me. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. "That there be appropriated $50,000 for the purpose of making the library at West Point fireproof, in accordance with the specifications submitted to the Secretary of War."

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine will reduce his amendment to writing.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Add on page 18, after line 24:
"For making the library fireproof according to the specifications already submitted by the Secretary of War, $50,000."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is new legislation; that it increases the amount of the appropriation carried by the bill instead of reducing it——

Mr. REED. That is precisely what this bill is for—new legislation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The appropriation is not in pursuance of any work already begun nor in pursuance of any legislation on the statute book.

Mr. REED. Almost every paragraph of this bill would be liable to that point of order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That is very true, if anybody wanted to make the point.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. While I fully concur with the chairman of the committee [Mr. OUTHWAITE] that at this time it is not expedient to make this appropriation, I can not agree with him that it is subject to the point of order. The law provides for a Military Academy at West Point; and it has been the custom of the House, ever since we have had appropriation bills to support the Academy, to provide in such bills for all that is necessary to maintain this Military Academy. To repair a library and preserve the books is strictly in accordance with the purposes of the Academy; and this appropriation, therefore, is in continuation of work already established and authorized by law. I think the amendment is not subject to the point of order. Nevertheless, I am opposed to making the appropriation of $50,000 at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Then, Mr. Chairman, I would like the gentleman in charge of this bill to point out the estimate for any such improvement as this.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I did not say that the estimate for this had come to us. It went to the Secretary of War and was stricken out before it came to us. It was a matter which was carefully investigated by the Board of Visitors.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. This improvement is absolutely unnecessary at the present time. The library at West Point is sufficiently fireproof; there is no great danger of the burning of those books. The library is quite as safe as it has been for a long period of years. The estimates as sent to us by the Secretary of War do not embrace this item—a fact which shows that the Secretary of War, who has investigated the subject, came to the conclusion that this would be an unnecessary expense at the present time. And it is an unnecessary expense. The appropriation was not even considered by the committee. I was surprised when I heard the gentleman from Alabama mention it as one of the items which we had stricken out of the bill in order to reduce expenditures. It never was before the committee.

Mr. REED. I ought to express my regret at having been misled; but my confidence was so great that I yielded to the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama. I am pained to find myself in conflict with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE], whom also I have been in the habit of following. It really tears me asunder, as it were [laughter]; and I am halting between two opinions—waiting for the result of this discussion before declaring my final conclusion.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The report states that appropriations aggregating $559,000 were recommended to the Secretary of War for the Military Academy, including $50,000 for improving the library. Now, I happen to be very familiar with this matter, because the Speaker of the House did me the honor to send me to West Point last June. The Board of Visitors discussed this matter in their report and recommended this expenditure; it was in the estimates as they came from the Superintendent; and for the moment it did not occur to me to mention that it was stricken out before it reached the Military Committee.

But whether this item is embraced in the present estimates or not, it was estimated for by the Superintendent of the Academy and has been stricken out by the Secretary of War or the Military Committee. Whether the credit of this measure of economy should be given to the Secretary of War or to our committee is entirely immaterial. We are all Democrats—all seeking for one end—to run this Government in the most economical way possible consistent with the greatness and glory of the Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. REED. I had rather got that impression already. What I really started in to do was to have the gentleman from Alabama (who is so competent to do such a thing) point out the exact items which the Secretary of War regarded as so important and which amounted to $65,000, but which have been stricken out. In my hunt for that $65,000 I have come across another item for $50,000, which it seems ought to be in the bill; because I am quite sure the gentleman from Alabama, with his economical habits and language, which have grown to be a part of his nature, would not suggest an appropriation of $50,000 unless he really meant it; and the fact that he did it in a sort of somnambulistic state shows how completely the matter has penetrated his conscience and thought and methods of life. Thus we have got at about $100,000.

What I wanted to do was to find out just what items would be thrust over upon a Republican Congress, in order that we might know to a certain extent what would be the size of the outcry which will come when we make up the deficiencies that the poverty of this country, resulting from Democracy, has caused to be made in this particular bill. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

This is a little bit of a bill; but you can always learn from one, if not all, at least a great many things; and this shows what will be the foundation of some of the Democratic outcries in the future. I suppose these appropriation bills are all of them going to be full of such omissions; only I am afraid that other gentlemen will not exhibit that candor which the gentleman from Alabama always exhibits; for he wears his heart on his sleeve in such matters. I say these bills will be full of these omissions which will have to be supplied by the next Republican Congress, or perhaps I had better say simply the next Congress [laughter], and then there will be the usual Democratic outcry, which may not take the form of "billion-dollar Congress," but which will take some form suited to the capacity of those to whom the gentlemen on that side appeal. I thought that perhaps by laying an anchor to windward in this way I might, if I did not accomplish anything else, prick the consciences of some gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I regret very much that the gentleman from Maine should seek this opportunity to criticise the efforts of those who are responsible for legislation in this body. We are using commendable efforts at economy.

The Democratic party always scrutinize estimates and omit all items which can properly be dispensed with or postponed. The Republican party on the contrary crowd in their appropriation bills everything which occurs to their fertile imaginations. By our system millions upon millions of dollars are saved; by their system millions upon millions of the people's money are squandered. The distinguished gentleman need not entertain either hopes or apprehensions that this country will again be afflicted with a Republican Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] has the floor.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine is a "little previous" in his suggestion that there is in this bill a postponement of certain items for the purpose of letting them go over to a Republican Congress. Before there is the possibility of a Republican Congress the gentleman should remember that there will be another meeting of this Congress and another bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs for the support of the Military Academy. And in this connection let me say that in the Committee on Military Affairs there is about as little politics, in the consideration of appropriation bills, or of any other matters, as will be found in any other committee of this House or elsewhere.

The items of this bill were carefully and conscientiously considered by this committee. I do not know of any difference of opinion, or any dissensions whatever as to the amount of any of the items. It is true that as the matters were under consideration there were some gentlemen who thought that possibly a little larger appropriation should be made in some instances, while in other instances members of the committee thought smaller amounts would suffice. But as to this item now under consideration which comes so suddenly upon us and which the committee have never had an opportunity to consider, I must appeal to the members of the Committee of Military Affairs, and to the members of the Committee of the Whole, who are considering the matter, that they vote it down.

Mr. Chairman, if this committee will take the bill and look through it, it will be found that in all instances a reasonable sum has been appropriated for the proposed works of improvement. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to throw anything over to a succeeding Congress, or to a succeeding session of this Congress. We have appropriated in this bill several large items already which have been postponed by other committees. I will say that this very item, for instance, in regard to the flooring of that hall, being so essential to the health of the cadets there, was an item proposed as early as the Fifty-first Congress, a proposition of that kind having been offered at that time.

We have attempted from that time to this to have the item become a part of the law. There are some other items here that also come over from a period as far back as that. We have made provision for the construction of a reservoir, at an expense of $25,000, that has been a matter of suggestion for four or five years past. We have also made a provision of $5,000 for completing, modernizing, and improving the plumbing and sewerage of the post. The last Congress appropriated for this purpose the sum of $20,000, which was found to be insufficient.

Here is another provision for completing the plumbing in the new sinks and bathrooms for cadets, $1,200, and so on, showing altogether, as I have said, a large sum of money appropriated for permanent improvements and necessary improvements, covering some four or five pages of this bill.

It is a fair bill; it is a generous bill, and it is a just disposition of the question. I trust the committee, therefore, will not hesitate to vote down the amendment, or rather I will ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. REED. I could not do that without the consent of the gentleman in charge of the bill, who suggested the amendment.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I will consent to the withdrawal of the amendment, as I told the gentleman I did not agree as to the propriety of its adoption at this time.

Mr. REED. I will withdraw it, for I shall not be found willing to interrupt the harmony of this occasion. [Laughter.]

I offered the amendment at the suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama. I thought it a good amendment, a very sensible one; and I was struck with the propriety of his suggestion when he made it. But of course I would not stand up here against the appeal of the gentleman from Ohio. I have accomplished my purpose in calling attention to the fact that so many items of appropriation have been omitted from the bill to go over to some future Congress, and that the reductions made in the total of the bill are only secured by such omissions. But I recognize the condition in which the country has been placed by the impoverishing effects of one year of Democratic rule, and that it is absolutely unable to provide money to meet the expenditures necessary. [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE (interruping). Mr. Chairman, I wish to enter a general denial of that part of the proposition of the gentleman from Maine wherein he states that necessary objects of appropriation have been deferred. Nothing of the kind was done in this bill.

Mr. REED. I have no sort of doubt that the gentleman from Ohio entertains the opinion he seeks so impressively to enforce upon the committee; but the language of the committee in its report is this:

> The committee have stricken out many items which were regarded as very important; but by careful investigation it was found that a delay of a year would not be attended with any serious results.

Now, of course, I understand that the country is in straits, that it needs to be economical, and consequently that important matters ought to be put over and not cumber the appropriation bills of this Congress so as to preserve the general harmony of the plan. [Laughter.] And, therefore, at the request of both gentlemen concerned, I withdraw the amendment and will allow the bill to proceed harmoniously as far as I am concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine is withdrawn.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I probably used a little stronger language than was necessary; my purpose was to point out the great care used by the committee to reduce the appropriation to the smallest amount possible, consistent with good administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there is no amendment pending.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Very well, then, let the Clerk proceed.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For furnishing and erecting in the natatorium of the gymnasium, in complete working order, six slate-lined compartments with six combination shower, spray, and needle baths, one gas heater, and one hot-water storage tank, $850, to be immediately available.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for some explanation in regard to the appropriation which has just been read, on page 19, from line 3 to line 7. Is it necessary to complete this natatorium in the magnificent manner intended by this committee? I should like to know why it is necessary that in an institution of this kind there should be such expense in equipping a natatorium, when the beautiful Hudson River runs right along at the foot of the cliff on which that institution is built?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The Hudson River is sometimes frozen up.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. When it is frozen up they have their bath tubs to take the place of the river.

Mr. HULL. The river is not a good place to swim in, right there.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I should like to know why it is necessary, in the construction of that natatorium, to be so lavish and expensive? I make the point of order also that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I would like to explain to the gentleman the reason why it is necessary to have this appropriation. The natatorium has only been recently completed; it is situated in the gymnasium, and the medical officers speak of it as being highly beneficial to the health and comfort of the cadets. The cadets wash themselves in these bath tubs and then plunge into the swimming bath.

I want to say to the gentleman that the officers of the Academy discourage the boys from going to the river to swim. There have been several drowned, and we do not want to have young men sent to that Academy to incur such risk. It is certainly not wise or prudent to allow cadets to swim in the river at that point, where there are swift currents, and where it would be dangerous for the most skillful swimmer to bathe.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Is that the case with the Hudson all the way along there?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The only appropriate place to bathe is at what is called Gees Point. The river there is very rapid and it has a rocky bottom. Two or three cadets, to my knowledge, have been drowned by striking rocks in diving into the water or by being carried out by the current.

Mr. CABANISS. If they were compelled to bathe in the river, what would they do in the winter time?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It may be said that the young men ought to know where the rocks are; but when they go there for the first time to bathe, with nobody to warn them, they are liable to strike the rocks while diving into the water, and some have been injured and some drowned; and, as remarked by my friend from Georgia [Mr. CABANISS], bathing in the river could not extend beyond the summer months.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] yield?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON].

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I offer an amendment to strike this out, and take the floor on that. I want to ask if this natatorium has not been already constructed?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It has.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. And if this appropriation is not for furnishing and erecting in the natatorium of the gymnasium, in complete working order, six slate-lined compartments with six combination shower, spray, and needle baths?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is; but as I have explained to my friend, the appropriation in the previous bill being cut down, it was not sufficient to provide for these bath tubs. This appropriation is to finish this important work. The natatorium was constructed with money appropriated under the previous bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. As I understand, the natatorium has nothing to do with bath tubs. It is a basin filled with water, is it not?

Mr. STOCKDALE. A swimming place.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I should think there was no necessity for bath tubs in the natatorium. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all the words in line 4, beginning after the word "gymnasium," down to and including the word "baths," in line 6. I do that because I understand that the natatorium has already been constructed, and I am not in favor of fitting up at West Point a natatorium equal to that which may be found in some of the greatest cities of the world. I think this is a useless expenditure in the education of young men. They have plenty of water to keep them clean, and I can not see how or in what manner, under the circumstances, "six slate-lined compartments, with six combination shower, spray, and needle baths," can be in any way connected with the matter of education, or even with the matter of hygiene.

I hope the committee will strike this out. There is a natatorium there. It is complete, and I shall offer further an amendment to reduce the appropriation in this section to the amount required with the matter stricken out which I have indicated.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I think any man who goes up to West Point and sees what these boys have to do, and how they are trained, and the strictness with which they are managed, and the intelligence with which that institution is run by the officers in charge, will not for a moment begrudge this little appropriation.

Now, I have been there and have seen this bathing place; and it is certainly necessary for the cleanliness and the good health of these boys. The cadets at West Point get nothing of luxury. There is no class of boys in this country who work as hard, who have as much physical exercise, who have to train as much and to study as hard as these boys do. Even in winter they are up at a quarter to 6 o'clock in the morning. They have to drill, and they have to take their swim in the bath; and notwithstanding the opinion of my friend who has offered this amendment, even at West Point they believe that cleanliness is next to Godliness. They believe it is necessary to keep themselves clean; and whatever may be the sentiment in the district in which my friend lives, I think that one of the best things to train these boys up in is to be clean in body, for if a man be kept clean in body he will be very apt to keep clean in character at the same time. I believe that a man who has developed a character for cleanliness in that respect is liable to be clean in every other way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, my friend talks about bathing in the Hudson River. I know something about that point. I went up against that current when I was before the mast of an old brig, and I know that running down the river the current is more than six knots an hour. The Hudson comes down directly from the North and then makes a turn almost direct at a right angle and comes through a very narrow place and runs directly east and then runs south, and the current up the river runs at the rate of five or six knots an hour when the tide is running up, and when it is running down it runs about six or more knots. I know, as my friend from Alabama has said, that several young men have been drowned there.

It is a dangerous place for even a good swimmer. I think that giving this bath under a roof, and inside of a building is one of the best things in connection with that institute; and I hope the House will not be niggardly, because it would only be saving a little at the spigot. I understand that it costs the Government about $25,000 apiece for every student who graduates at West Point, taking into consideration all the cost connected with his education and training. Now, if we are going to lay out so much money as that to graduate each of these boys who may hereafter serve the Government in the Army, shall we bring them up dirty in order to save a few cents? I do not think that this House thinks so, and I do not believe this House will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HULL. The point of order has been withdrawn, as I understand.

Mr. SICKLES. It has been overruled.

Mr. HULL. I simply want to say that this question was up in the Fifty second Congress. An appropriation was made to build a natatorium, with the idea that it would be finished up when we reached the point that it should be necessary. The old bath tubs that they have there are being abandoned. The old building has outlived its usefulness, and it is absolutely necessary to have these bath tubs. We can save the expense of more than the amount by discontinuing the use of the old dilapidated bathhouse they have had heretofore. Of course, the gentleman from Louisiana was only speaking in a jocular mood when he referred to these young men going to the river at the bend to bathe. He does not mean anything by that. He only means that in the summer they may go bathing or may go swimming there.

The Government has constructed this building, and they have the new natatorium; but they need the bathtubs. There is not a member of this House who will not understand and appreciate the fact that these boys, with their violent exercise, as referred to by the gentleman from Maine, do need frequent baths; and there is not a member of this House, and the gentleman from Louisiana, I am certain, would be as far from thinking so as anyone, that they ought not to have these improved baths. Agreeing to the gentleman's amendment would not save the item of $800, but probably might save $400, and there is nothing in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana and everything against it.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I move to strike out the last word. In response to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. MILLIKEN] in regard to his knowledge of the condition at West Point, I desire to state to him that I am familiar with that military post. I was a member of the Board of Visitors in the Fiftieth Congress, I believe, and I was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs when it made an appropriation of $100,000 to construct a gymnasium, and when it made that munificent appropriation of five hundred and odd thousand dollars to construct the Academy building. I have watched the course of appropriations for this institution. My amendment, Mr. Chairman, does not intend to strike out the natatorium or swimming pool of that institution.

I do not think we should do that. The argument which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] has made with regard to my desire to prevent the cadets bathing is not substantiated when he looks at the amendment which I have proposed. I propose to strike out these words: "six slate-lined compartments with six combination shower, spray, and needle baths."

Mr. HULL. Do not you believe that they need the bathtubs as much as they need the swimming pool?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Yes, sir; and the bath tubs are already there. They have been in existence in the basement of the academic building for I do not know how many years, and they are there still, bath tubs outside of this gymnasium. The baths proposed here will not accomplish the result which the gentleman refers to. These other bath tubs will still remain and be used by the cadets in their company apartments in the basement of the building.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment, and propose to strike out "eight" and insert "four" in line 6, making the amount $450; because I believe that this institution can get along well without these things, and in these times when there is a deficit in the Treasury, and in view of the fact that we have done more than any other nation has ever done for an institution of this kind, I believe we should restrict these appropriations to the things that are absolutely necessary for the proper conduct of this great military school.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I will say to my friend from Louisiana that the committee have already cut down the estimates a great deal.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Louisiana is evidently entirely mistaken as to the purpose of this appropriation. There is a large swimming bathroom. The cadets frequently come in from their drill covered with dust. In the artillery drills they exercise violently and perspire freely and are enveloped in a cloud of dust, and it is the same in the cavalry drill. It is not possible to replace the water in this great swimming bath as often as it should be done, and therefore these small bath tubs are required, so that the cadets may bathe in them and clean their persons before they plunge into the swimming bath, and the regulations require that they shall do so. The cadets are not allowed to go into the swimming bath until they have previously bathed in these small bath tubs, where they wash off the dust and perspiration. Then they go into the swimming pool clean and do not contaminate it. I say to the gentleman that this is essential, and I am surprised to hear him say that it is not in the interest of hygiene. I trust the committee will not hesitate to appropriate this amount, and will vote down the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. What is the estimate for the construction of these six slate-lined compartments with the six combined shower, spray, and needle baths?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Eight hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Then what is the estimated cost of the gas meter and the hot storage tank?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. All these are estimated for as one item.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; they are all estimated together at $850. Here is what is stated by the Department as to the necessity for these things:

With regard to the item for furnishing and erecting in the natatorium of the gymnasium six slate-lined compartments for shower, spray, and needle baths, I would state that it is proposed to add these, firstly, on account of their hygienic importance, and, secondly, as a measure of economy. The water in the swimming tank at present becomes contaminated in a few days, necessitating frequent changes. The shower bath should be used before entering the tank. The capacity of the tank is so great that every time it is refilled it reduces the amount of water in storage noticeably.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I would like to know where the economy comes in.

Mr. SICKLES. It is in the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I can not believe that this is an absolutely necessary appropriation in connection with the instruction of the students at West Point. The natatorium is there, the Hudson River is there, and there are bath rooms under the sleeping rooms in the cadet barracks. There is an abundant supply of water. I believe it is proper for these young gentlemen to have all the water that they require to bathe in, but I do not believe in giving it to them in the manner proposed by this provision of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and, in my own time, I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama how much money is involved in this amendment?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. About $450. I understand the gentleman proposes to strike out $400 of this item.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I would strike it all out.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman proposed awhile ago to strike out half, but now he proposes to strike it all out.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. No, sir; the amendment I offered would strike out $400, leaving about $450 in the bill to provide for this gas heater and hot-water storage tank.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If that amendment should prevail, the result would be to compel the students to jump into the swimming tank without having previously washed themselves, and thus to contaminate it, and the gentleman's cadet and every other cadet there would have to swim in contaminated water.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. How did the gentleman from Alabama get along when he was there fifty years ago? Did he have this "spray" and this "needle bath" to keep him clean? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I beg the gentleman not to announce to this House that I was at West Point fifty years ago. I was a baby at that time, and did not know there was such a place as West Point. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Chairman, if my friend from Louisiana has been at West Point, as he says he has, and as of course I do not doubt, he knows one thing, namely, that no luxuries are furnished to the cadets there. He knows that the whole idea upon which the institution is conducted is to bring them up as strong, rugged boys, without indulging them in delicacies. Why, sir, you can not even carry any delicacies to a cadet of your own there. If your own boy is there you can not carry him a pound of gingerbread or candy, or anything of that kind.

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. That is a good thing.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Yes, sir; and I would be glad if all the gentleman's ideas were as good as that. Now, it is not probable—it is hardly possible—that those who have the supervision of this Academy and are enforcing this strict discipline would recommend for these boys anything in the form of luxury. This is a mere matter of cleanliness; and I do not believe that this House wants those boys at West Point to go dirty for the sake of saving this country a matter of $400.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, to strike out in the pending paragraph the words "six slate-lined compartments with six combination shower, spray, and needle baths," the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ROBERTSON] withdraw the other amendment?

Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana. I do.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs, new machines, and fixtures for gymnasium, $300, to be immediately available.

Mr. STOCKDALE. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to consume time unnecessarily on this bill, but for the purpose of getting some information I move to strike out the pending paragraph.

At the top of this page I find the following item:

For completing the modernization and improvement of the plumbing and sewerage of the post, $5,000.

Further down on the same page I find an item of $1,200 "for completing the plumbing in the new sink and bathrooms for cadets."

Mr. SICKLES. One is the drainage; the other is in the building.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I understand that. But I instance these two items for the purpose of bringing to view what I want to suggest. On these two or three pages of the bill are various items for repairs, in sums such as $100, $150, $300, etc. Now, as I understand, the Government has frequently saved money by putting improvements of this sort under the direction of a single man and allowing him to hire the labor and have the work done. When the appropriations are made in this way, no doubt the expenditure in each instance goes up to the limit of the appropriation, whereas if all these items (and I believe in having the items specified) were put under the control of one man to have the work done, money might be saved.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I think not, in this instance. These items have been submitted because it has been the custom to do so, and because Congress itself has preferred to have the items.

The Committee on Military Affairs have been unusually careful in the preparation of this bill, scrutinizing even the smallest items carefully; and no item has been inserted unless its necessity was clearly made out. The Superintendent of the Academy came here before the committee; he was questioned for some time as to each of these items, and the committee were satisfied in regard to some; were not satisfied in regard to others. Only those items which were shown to be necessary have been inserted in the bill. I can assure the gentleman that the committee exercised a proper spirit of economy in regard to these expenditures and carefully considered in respect to every proposed improvement the necessity of making it at once. On this score there need be no hesitation in approving the items of the bill.

Mr. STOCKDALE. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Chairman, as one member of the Committee on Military Affairs I wish to say that the committee spent a great deal of time in preparing this bill. It was under consideration I believe more than five weeks; the committee had a great many meetings, and at nearly every meeting there was a full committee, with the exception of one or two. The bill has come into the House with the unanimous approval of the committee, including the Republican as well as the Democratic members. On one or two administrative provisions a point of order may be raised; but so far as the appropriations are concerned the bill comes here with a unanimous report. Every line of the bill has been scrutinized. Where the proof was not before the committee in connection with the estimates of the Secretary of War, we called upon the Superintendent or other officers of the institution.

In the committee room is an immense pile of correspondence touching every item and every line of the bill. This is as carefully considered a measure as has ever been presented to this Congress or any other. I hope the bill will pass as it came from the committee. If there has been any error at all it has been that appropriations have been made too small rather than too large; yet the members of the committee concur in the belief that practically the appropriations are sufficient to carry on this institution respectably and successfully.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has now been disposed of except the paragraph on page 2, which was passed over.

Mr. HULL. I desire to raise a point of order on that part of the bill commencing with the word "and," in line 12 of page 2, down to and including the word "repealed" in line 18. I ask that the Clerk read the clause to which this point of order applies.

The Clerk read as follows:

and hereafter no graduate of the Military Academy shall be assigned or detailed to serve at said Academy as a professor, instructor, or assistant to either within two years after his graduation, and so much of the act of June 30, 1882, as is in conflict with this provision is hereby repealed.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, Rule XXI provides—

Nor shall any provision in any such bill—

That is, a general appropriation bill—or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as, being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

My point of order is that in the first place the proposition is not germane, because it is a provision affecting the law by which the cadets may be detailed as instructors in the Military Academy. This, Mr. Chairman, is an appropriation bill. By the law as it exists to-day the cadet must serve a certain period of time before he can be detailed as an instructor in the Academy. This is a proposition in an appropriation bill to change that law by making the term of service two years instead of four years. It does not reduce expenditures, but, on the contrary, it rather increases them if anything, in that respect, for it increases the salary of the instructor. It does not increase, of course, the amount of the expenditure, because if the cadet is not detailed some one else is instead. The point is, however, that it changes the law, which if it be changed at all, should be changed by a separate bill.

I do not understand that the question is at issue as to the advisability of the change. If it were, I should say I believe that one of the most important and effective parts of the education of the student is the four years' service in the field. I believe that the four years' active service in the field, after the cadet has left the Academy, is worth fully as much as the four years' time spent in his studies at the Academy. But the point of order, as I understand it, can not go to the advisability of the change.

To my mind the whole question of this provision is covered by the rule which provides that you shall not incorporate on an appropriation bill such provisions, which change existing law, unless you can show at the same time that they diminish or reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Will not the Chair hear a word from the other side?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The Chair will withhold the decision on the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that the provision is not subject to the point of order. The gentleman from Iowa who has just spoken alleges that it is, and he gives two reasons. First, he says it is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill; but I contend that it is germane because it provides for the pay of officers and then prescribes what character of officers can be detailed for this work. That settles the point as to its being germane. It reduces expenditures——

Mr. HULL. What is in the bill about regulating the teachers?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama (continuing). It reduces expenditures, because the officers who serve but two years in the Army have less pay than those who have served a longer period of time, and this fact relieves it from the point of order.

As to the expediency of the change, I will state that this was recommended in the strongest terms by the Academic Board, and received the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, that is hardly to the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. But the gentleman from Iowa made allusion to this matter, and I certainly have a right to reply to it. The officials of the Academy experience great difficulty in securing the best officers of the Army as instructors—the best class of officers now——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield for a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman state wherein and when the Secretary of War ever recommended this?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. On reflection I recollect now, and I will submit to the correction, that this came more especially from the Superintendent of the Academy and the Academic Board. But it had the full sanction of the Secretary of War, and was transmitted by him to the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not pretend to say that the recommendation came with the original estimates.

It has been a very serious matter to secure the best class of instructors at the Academy after they have served for a period of four or five years. The best officers are then developed and selected for other duty; and to show the great difficulty in this respect I repeat that the Superintendent of the Academy had to apply for fifteen officers before he succeeded in securing an instructor for one of the departments of the Academy. This difficulty would be obviated in the measure by extending the field of selection as proposed by this paragraph.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. On that theory why not bring in a bill to change the law so they can do as they please?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The gentleman from Iowa knows very well the difficulty——

Mr. MARSH (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this question of order had better be disposed of, and then if necessary the merits of the proposition may be discussed.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I think when the gentleman from Iowa has discussed the point of order and also the question of expediency, it is very proper that there should be some reply to every point of the argument; and I am surprised that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] should wish to interrupt discussion on the proposition at this time, because if it is not explained now it will not be understood by the House.

Mr. MARSH. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not want to prevent, but I want to open up the way for the discussion of the merits when the merits come properly before the committee.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If the indication given by the Chair correctly tells us his opinion I do not see how the merits can be discussed after the point of order has been passed upon. I repeat that in efforts to get one officer the Superintendent was compelled to send in some fifteen names.

Officers of only two years' service have not as a rule been selected for other duty, and the Secretary of War is therefore enabled to detail these younger officers for duty at the Academy.

That is a question of expediency, but I feel certain that the point of order should not be sustained. I insist that the paragraph is germane and that it reduces expenditures. Therefore I trust the Chair will rule that the paragraph is not subject to the point of order. It is certainly germane, because it is simply describing the kind of officers who shall be detailed. It is certainly reducing expenditures, because the laws of our country fixing the pay of the Army are such that officers who are permitted by this paragraph to be detailed have less pay than officers who have been in the Army at least four years. I hope the Chair will not sustain the point of order.

Mr. HULL. Is there any increase of pay to officers before they have served five years?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. In many cases there would be. At the end of every five years the pay of officers is increased by what is called longevity, and such an officer would have 10 per cent more than an officer who had been in the Army a shorter period.

Mr. HULL. Would not the increase be the same, whether he is detailed or not, except for the professor s additional pay?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes; the question of longevity comes in, and an officer of longer service receives more pay and frequently, after four years in the artillery, they become first lieutenants, which again increases the pay. Therefore, the pay of an officer of but two years' service is less, and this paragraph consequently does retrench expenditures and is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order. It is admitted by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] that this is new legislation, and on its face it does not reduce expenditures. Therefore the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move that the committee rise and report the bill favorably to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. O'NEIL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5894) making appropriations for the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and had directed him to report the same favorably to the House, without amendment.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I move the previous question upon the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

FURNITURE FOR UNITED STATES COURTS, CHICAGO.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk (H. Res. 147).

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to transfer to the rooms now occupied and used by the United States courts at Chicago, the furniture and carpets heretofore used by said courts and the officers thereof in the public building at said city, and the United States marshal for the northern district of the State of Illinois shall execute a receipt to the custodian of the public building at Chicago for the articles so transferred, and such articles shall be returned when required by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] for the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. BURROWS. I hope the gentleman will explain the object of this.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would like to have read the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which explains this resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 23, 1894.

DEAR SIR: I transmit herewith a form of a resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer certain furniture from the public building at Chicago to the rooms now occupied by the United States courts in that city, with the request that the same be considered and passed at as early a day as possible.

The United States courts have been removed from the public building to rented premises, and unless some provision is made by which this furniture can be used in the rented building, it will be necessary to expend from $10,000 to $12,000 in the purchase of new furniture; and, as the courts will meet at a very early day, prompt action is necessary in this case.

Very truly, yours,

J. G. CARLISLE, Secretary.

Hon. JO ABBOTT,
House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BANKHEAD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to going into committee, because it is obvious that a quorum, or half of a quorum, is not present.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. REED. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 71; noes 3.

Mr. REED. Just as I thought; there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. HENDERSON, and the gentleman from Maine, Mr. REED.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. There is evidently not a quorum here, and I do not want to take up the time of the House for nothing. I will state to the gentleman from Maine that there are a great many uncontested items in this bill, and I shall be perfectly willing to agree, if we can take it up, to pass over for the present the items to which there are objections.

Mr. REED. We have had unexampled activity to-day, as we have passed one appropriation bill. You can take a recess.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. As there is no quorum here, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. REED. I will withdraw the point of no quorum. Both suggestions have been withdrawn, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The vote, however, has been taken.

Mr. REED. The point of no quorum has been withdrawn, and the gentleman withdraws the motion to go into committee. That can be done by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent it can, of course, be done. There being no objection, then, the motion to go into Committee of the Whole and the point of no quorum will be withdrawn. The Chair will lay before the House requests of members.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. MCETTRICK, until Tuesday, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. GILLET of New York, for ten days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. ALDRICH (on motion of Mr. MERCER), for to-day, on account of sickness.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, the evening session to be devoted to business under the rule. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] will perform the duties of the Chair at the evening session; and the Chair now declares the House in recess until 8 o'clock.

Accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. BROOKSHIRE, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read clause 3 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. The House shall, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, which evening session shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, under the rule just read.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to have a count, Mr. Speaker, and I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes none.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we have enough people here to do any work. I think I will make the point of no quorum upon this. [After a pause.] I do not make the point now, but will wait awhile and see how this thing works.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes have it, the motion is agreed to, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BRETZ] will take the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

ADDISON M. COPEN.

The first business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1868) for the relief of Addison M. Copen.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. KILGORE. I did not exactly understand the reading of that bill, but it appears to me to be obnoxious to a point of order that it is not within the jurisdiction of these Friday night sessions.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, as chairman of that committee I have been here several times, and have never found anyone in the committee to defend the bill; and I move that it be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman makes the point of order?

Mr. KILGORE. I will insist upon the point of order if there is anything in it. I am not certain from the reading of the bill whether the point of order is well taken or not.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. It is properly before the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order; and the question is on ordering the bill to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I object. I understand that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] made a motion that the bill be reported back with a recommendation that it lie on the table, where I think it ought to be.

Mr. MOSES. I move that the bill be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON HISLOP.

The next business in order was the bill (H. R. 5020) granting a pension to Washington Hislop.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to place on the pension roll, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Washington Hislop, late of the Marengo Light Guards, Indiana Legion, the said Hislop having received injuries in the Morgan raid.

Mr. BRETZ. I ask for the reading of the report.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. I move that that bill be reported back to the House with the recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 5020) granting a pension to Washington Hislop, and submit the following report:

The petitioner has filed no claim in the Pension Bureau for the reason that having been in the State militia he has no pensionable status under the general laws. He alleges that he was in a band of men organized to repel the raid of John Morgan's men, and that in a battle about July 1, 1863, near Salem, Ind., he received a gunshot wound in the forehead at the hands of the enemy. He furnishes the testimony of David Denton, of Fargo, Ind., and John Agan, of Valeene, Ind., tending to show that he was wounded, as alleged; also a certificate from Dr. John McDonald, of Valeene, Ind., to the effect that the petitioner is very deaf, and that he has a scar on the forehead, over the left eye, extending about 2½ inches to the right, having the appearance of a gunshot wound. Fountain Burton and James Grimes, of Fargo, Ind., testify that the petitioner owns 40 acres of land, worth $250, and personal property not to exceed $150.

It has been the policy of Congress in recent years to pension men not regularly in the military service of the United States only for wounds incurred in action with the enemy. This policy would suggest that the petitioner should be pensioned for such gunshot wound as he may have received as he alleges, and that he be required to prove the origin of such wound in the same manner as regular soldiers must do under the provisions of the general law. To do more than this would be to place him on a better basis than are the soldiers of the war, which would clearly be unjust.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass after being amended as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Legion," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "at a rate proportionate to the degree of disability from such gunshot wound of the forehead as may be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior to have been incurred in an engagement with the enemy during the Morgan raid."

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there is a motion pending to report the bill to the House with a recommendation that it be laid on the table.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARE). The Clerk will report the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Legion," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the words "at a rate proportionate to the degree of disability from such gunshot wound of the forehead as may be shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior to have been incurred in an engagement with the enemy during the Morgan raid."

Mr. BRETZ. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the bills we had up some time ago when the nature of this claim was fully stated to the House. There was some question as to whether there were any precedents for a special bill of this character.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Not having been present when the report was read, Mr. Chairman, I wish to know how it was this soldier got wounded?

Mr. BRETZ. I will state that to the gentleman from Georgia. In July, 1863, Gen. Morgan crossed the Ohio River on a raid through Indiana and Ohio. This man belonged to an organization in the State of Indiana known as the Indiana Legion, or Home Guard, and was regularly mustered into that service. I do not mean that he was mustered into the United States service; but he was regularly mustered in, and was subject to the order of the governor of the State. When Gen. Morgan crossed the river and went through Indiana into Ohio, these men were called out and pursued him.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Who called them out, the governor?

Mr. BRETZ. The governor of the State—Governor Morton. Near Salem, Ind., there was an engagement between Gen. Morgan's forces and this organization, and in that engagement the man received a gunshot wound in the forehead, of the truth of which I know nothing, except that which is contained in the statement and the proof of those who were with him. There are quite a number of affidavits to that effect from those who were with him in that service.

Now, this bill provides that he must prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that he was wounded in an engagement in defense of the State, that he was wounded by the enemy, and unless he is able to make that proof he gets no pension. In other words, this bill simply gives him a day in court. It does not give him any specific sum at all, but simply allows him to make his proof. If he received a wound that entitles him to a pension and he can make satisfactory proof of it, he gets just as much pension as he can show he is entitled to.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Under the law of 1890?

Mr. BRETZ. It only lets him go before the Interior Department to prove his case.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. It simply gives him a status before the Department to prove his claim.

Mr. BRETZ. Exactly.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. Subject to the provisions of the pension laws.

Mr. BRETZ. Certainly; subject to all the provisions of the existing pension laws.

Mr. STALLINGS. Why did he not go in under the old law?

Mr. BRETZ. He could not. He was not a regularly enlisted soldier. He belonged to what was known as the Indiana Legion.

Mr. COX. He was called out by the governor of the State.

Mr. BRETZ. Yes; by the governor.

Mr. COX. He was a soldier of the State.

Mr. BRETZ. That is what he was.

Mr. COX. Now, has not the State in her legislation made any provision for such cases?

Mr. BRETZ. No, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. There is none in our State, nor in any of the Northern States.

Mr. COX. We have made such provision in the South, but that was the only thing we could do.

Mr. BRETZ. I will state further, that the captain of this man's company was pensioned for injuries received in that identical raid.

Mr. STALLINGS. May I ask the gentleman a question for information?

Mr. BRETZ. Certainly.

Mr. STALLINGS. Was there not a statute passed—I think in 1866—allowing pensions to militia soldiers, men situated like this one, provided they could prove disability received in the line of duty?

Mr. BRETZ. No, sir; I think not.

Mr. STALLINGS. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. I think there was such a statute and that I can show it, but I believe that under that statute the claimant was required to make his proof by 1874 or 1875.

Mr. BRETZ. I shall be very glad indeed if the gentleman can show such a statute as that. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. STALLINGS. I think there was a statute passed in 1865 or 1866 that gave to this class of soldiers, militiamen, pensions provided they prove their disabilities within a certain time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I think the gentleman is wrong.

I have no knowledge of any such statute which would apply to this case.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There was a Federal statute of that kind, but application had to be made under it by 1876.

Mr. STALLINGS. If there was such a statute as that I want to know why this man did not come in under it?

Mr. BRETZ. I will say to the gentleman that if there was any such statute as that, and I do not know anything about any such statute, it was never resorted to by anyone in Indiana or anywhere else that I know of, because Congress has been passing just such bills as this for the relief of the militiamen of various States of the Union. To show this, I will ask the Clerk to read a portion of the report in another case in the first session, Fiftieth Congress.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enoch Weathers enlisted in a volunteer militia company formed in Crawford County, Ind., in July, 1863, called the Marengo Light Guards, organized expressly for the purpose of suppressing the "Morgan raid."

The organization was in conformity to the militia law of Indiana, approved May 11, 1861, and it is proved that said company elected its officers and was mustered into the Indiana Legion, and that each member thereof took the oath of allegiance. The said Enoch Weathers was elected captain of said company, and was duly commissioned by Governor Oliver P. Morton. He asks that Congress pass a special act for his relief on the ground that while acting as a member of said company, and in line of duty, about the 17th day of July, 1863, at New Albany, Ind., while assisting in bringing a cannon on board of a boat he was ruptured in the right side by being severely struck with the tongue of a gun carriage. He has made no application for pension for the reason that the Pension Department do not consider claims arising from injuries received by persons belonging to State militia organizations.

Mr. BRETZ. Now, Mr. Chairman, that there may be no question as to its being the policy of Congress to pass bills of this kind, I will call attention to another case reported in the Fiftieth Congress, where a militiaman of West Virginia, acting in the same capacity as the man for whose benefit the pending bill is intended, received a pension. The same is true also of members of the militia of Kansas and of Illinois. So that there can be no question as to the precedents for a bill of this kind; the only difference being that in each of the cases to which I refer the applicant was granted a specific pension, while this bill does not grant any specific sum, but simply, as I have already said, permits this man to make his proof, and then, if he is able to do that, he is to receive such pension as his proof entitles him to. If he is unable to make the proof he gets no pension. Now, unless some gentleman desires to ask further questions, I will ask that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill being laid aside with a favorable recommendation. I think it is only fair and just that this man should be pensioned if he can make a satisfactory showing before the proper tribunal. The Congress of the United States did pass an enabling act to meet these cases, but I think the limitation ran against it in July, 1874, and evidently this man, if he was wounded as alleged in the bill and in the report, did not avail himself of that statute and probably never heard of it. I do not think it is good policy for us to make fish of one man and flesh of another. There are thousands and tens of thousands of men on the pension roll who did no more service and incurred no more disability than this man did.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Many of them not so much, for he was shot.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, this man was shot. He was shot, it is true, while in the service of the State, but while he was resisting the enemies of the Federal authority, and the man who had the moral courage to enter the State militia and fight such a gang as John Morgan carried with him is entitled to some notice and some consideration from this House. [Laughter.]

I hope there will not be a single vote on either side against laying this bill aside with a favorable report.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. STALLINGS. I will not occupy more than a moment. But I have some pride of opinion when it comes to the question of a statute which I have undertaken to cite. Now, I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the statutory provision bearing on this case, and to which I referred. It is in these words:

Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States, or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians, disabled in consequence of wounds or injury received in the line of duty in such temporary service. But no claim of a State militiaman, or nonenlisted person, on account of disability from wounds or injury received in battle with rebels or Indians, while temporarily rendering service, shall be valid unless prosecuted to a successful issue prior to the 4th day of July, 1874.

Now, I asked the gentleman why it was, if this man was disabled in that battle, he did not make claim under this statute? He had, as I understand, from 1864 till 1874 to make his claim. I wanted to know why that was not done.

Mr. BRETZ. I will not take issue with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] as to the statute. I will simply say I had no knowledge of the existence of any such statute. But the reading of this statutory provision shows that it expired in 1874.

Mr. STALLINGS. That is exactly what I suggested to the gentleman, and I asked him why advantage was not taken of this statute while it was in force.

Mr. BRETZ. Why this man never applied for a pension during the existence of that law I am unable to say. I suppose he was in the same condition as all these other men who have been pensioned by special acts, the reports on whose cases I hold in my hand. I refer to these bills passed during the Fiftieth and Fifty-first Congresses. I do not know why these persons did not apply during the existence of the statute. I suppose they knew nothing about it, as I presume was the case with this man.

Mr. CABANISS. On looking at this statute, I find that it was not passed until March, 1873; and as it expired in 1874, the soldier had only about one year in which to take advantage of it.

Mr. BRETZ. I thank my friend for that information; it confirms the suggestion I just made that these persons probably knew nothing about the statute.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suppose that under the circumstances it may reasonably be taken for granted that this man was not aware of the existence of such a statute.

Mr. BRETZ. That is what I say. It appears that the statute ran only about one year. Mr. Chairman, I now ask for a vote.

Mr. STALLINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CABANISS] where he gets his authority for stating that the provision which I read was not passed until 1873.

Mr. CABANISS. That is the annotation which I find on the margin—March 3, 1873.

Mr. STALLINGS. That applies to section 1; but this is section 3.

Mr. CABANISS. But section 3 is marked the same way.

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not care particulary about that matter. I only wanted to know why this man did not apply before the statute expired.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The answer is that presumably he did not know of the existence of the statute.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in my view it makes no difference whether this soldier knew of the existence of this statute or not. If he had known of it it would not have helped him. No soldier of this Indiana Legion could have been benefited at all by this statute. It will be observed that the wording is this:

Any person not an enlisted soldier in the Army, serving for the time being as a member of the militia of any State, under orders of an officer of the United States, or who volunteered for the time being to serve with any regularly organized military or naval force of the United States—

That is not this case at all.

Mr. STALLINGS. Read just one line further.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Well, I think even in that case——

Mr. STALLINGS (reading):

or who otherwise volunteered and rendered service in any engagement with rebels or Indians.

John Morgan was a "rebel."

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think the provision referred to has no reference at all to services rendered by the Indiana Legion. It never has been urged, I believe, on the floor of this House that in a case of this kind the act referred to had any application. Hence I think the question asked by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] is answered in this way—that the act cited does not cover this case.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments reported with this bill from the committee were, as the Chair understands, acted upon last Friday evening. The question is now, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

WARREN ALONZO ALDEN.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2108) to perfect the military record of Warren Alonzo Alden.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to enter the name of Warren Alonzo Alden upon the roll of Company H of the Ninety-second Ohio Volunteer Infantry, with a statement of the fact that he faithfully served the United States in said organization, commencing August 15, 1862, and continuing until January 5, 1863.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to complete the record as to the services of Warren Alonzo Alden in Company C, Fourth Independent Battalion Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, in which he served from July 10, 1863, to October 10, 1863.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The report as already published in the proceedings of last Friday night was again read.

Mr. STALLINGS. I should like to know who introduced the bill, and should like to have a statement from him.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. There is nothing in it, only to make this man eligible to join the Grand Army of the Republic. He can not draw a pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the bill was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DURBOROW].

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I move that it be passed without prejudice, so that the gentleman from Illinois may explain it.

Mr. STALLINGS. That has been the custom, to let the man who introduced a bill explain it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection.

LUCINDA C. WHEELER.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1463) granting a pension to Mrs. Lucinda C. Wheeler, widow of John H. Wheeler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Mrs. Lucinda C. Wheeler, widow of John H. Wheeler, late private in Company L, Seventh Regiment Tennessee Cavalry, in the war of 1861, and grant her a pension at the rate of $12 per month, subject, however, to the limitations of the pension laws.

The report, as published in the proceedings of Friday, March 16, was read.

Mr. STALLINGS. That is the case we had up here on last Friday night. I have examined the facts in that case as well as I could. I was opposed to it last Friday night, and I am opposed to it to-night, for the identical reasons I gave before. I will ask that that case be laid aside. There are other cases that ought to come up that are meritorious. I do not think it ought to be favorably reported, and I ask that it be laid aside.

Mr. PICKLER. I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I, of course, yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] in all that he says about his notion that there is no merit in this case, but the Committee on Invalid Pensions have examined this case carefully, have examined all the evidence, and they feel that the case is meritorious.

Mr. CABANISS. Who introduced it?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It was introduced by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If he is not here, let it be laid aside until he does come.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. If there be no objection, Mr. Chairman, I will ask that it be passed over until the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] can be here.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside without prejudice, until the author may have an opportunity to explain it. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CELESTIA P. HARTT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5351) granting a pension to Celestia P. Hartt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll the name of Celestia P. Hartt, widow of Samuel T. Hartt, late naval constructor, and allow her a pension equal to that allowed officers in the Navy of the grade of captain.

The report (by Mr. TAWNEY) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5351) granting a pension to Celestia P. Hartt, submit the following report:

The claimant is the widow of Samuel T. Hartt, who at the time of his death, and for twelve years prior thereto, was a naval constructor in the United States Navy. The records of the Navy Department show that he was appointed a naval constructor July 5, 1847, and served as such at the navy-yards at Norfolk, Va., and Pensacola, Fla., and that he died at Norfolk, Va., while still in the naval service, May 10, 1859.

The claim of the widow has been rejected because of the fact that at that time naval constructors were civilian employés, but it is shown that by Congressional legislation enacted July 25, 1866, naval constructors and first and second assistant engineers were given rank and pay as officers of the Navy.

It is shown by evidence satisfactory to your committee that the officer died from disease resulting from extraordinary exposure attending the burning to the water's edge of the steamer North Carolina in the waters of Chesapeake Bay in the early morning of January 29, 1859, compelling the crew and passengers to take to small boats at that inclement season of the year; that he was a passenger on said steamer and was returning to his station at the Norfolk navy-yard from Washington, D. C., whither he had gone on business connected with his official duties; that he lived less than five months after this catastrophe, leaving a widow, the claimant, who has ever since remained his widow, and five of his children, all under 8 years of age, to rear, with an embarrassed estate practically yielding no revenue to her.

The facts presented show that had the officer survived a few years and then died the title of his widow under the general pension laws would have been indefeasible, and, as it is shown that his death was due to disease contracted by him in performance of his duty, thus rendering the Government responsible for his premature death, your committee believe that she should have the benefit of the legislation subsequently enacted for the benefit of this class of officers and their widows.

Besides, it is shown that the claimant is over 63 years of age, in impaired health, and with no adequate source of subsistence.

The passage of the bill granting a pension as of the grade of naval constructor, with rank of captain, United States Navy ($30 per month), is recommended.

Mr. LANE. I want to raise a point of order on that bill.

Mr. MOSES. I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twelve."

Mr. LANE. What committee reported that bill?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The Pension Committee.

Mr. LANE. Had they any right to do that? I do not think this man was ever a soldier, or that he was ever in the army service at all, or in the naval service. I raise the point of order that the Committee on Pensions have no jurisdiction of this class of claims. They have only jurisdiction of matters connected with the Army or the Navy. He was in neither. He was simply an employé of the Government. I wish to raise the point of order that the committee have no jurisdiction in the matter.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. LANE], who raises the point of order, I desire to say that the rule relates not to the connection with the service, but to the performance of service in connection with the Department of the Army or Navy; and, therefore, either the Committee on Pensions or the Committee on Invalid Pensions have ample jurisdiction to consider a bill in relation to a person who served in a capacity connected with the Army or Navy, whether he was mustered in or not. If the service he rendered of that character justifies the committee in giving consideration to it, it comes, as a matter of equity, properly before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MOSES. I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twelve."

Mr. STALLINGS. Before that amendment is put I wish to know who introduced the bill?

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Chairman, I introduced this bill, and introduced it not simply for the purpose of getting anything that the committee might choose to grant this widow, but to have her placed on the roll where she is entitled to be placed. By reading the report of the committee and the facts stated, it will clearly appear to the committee that she is entitled to be placed on the pension rolls, and that she is entitled to all the rights that such action may give her.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TYLER. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. My understanding is that the husband of this lady died in 1859, and that at that time constructors in the Navy were civilians?

Mr. TYLER. That is true.

Mr. KILGORE. In 1866, however, Congress enacted a law putting constructors of the Navy on the same footing with soldiers.

Mr. TYLER. On the same footing with officers of the Navy.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes; with officers of the Navy. Now, I understand that the gentleman from Virginia seeks to make that law apply to this case.

Mr. TYLER. Just as it would apply to this case.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand if this party had lived through the war, had undergone the peril incident to the war, and had died after 1866, his widow would have been entitled to the benefits of that act. That is precisely the point on which the act of 1866 was passed, because these constructors during the war endured just as much hardship and peril as any officer in the Navy, and therefore they were entitled to the same privileges.

Mr. TYLER. I am free to admit, Mr. Chairman, that I understand that that is the reason of the passage of the law of 1866, placing these civilian employés, as they had not been up to that day, on an equality with the officers of the Navy; but I say to the gentleman that as far as any peril these officers might have passed through because of the war, it did not exceed that endured by this constructor, who died by reason of exposure during an accident in line of duty.

Mr. KILGORE. That is merely the opinion of the committee, and they are liable to be mistaken about that.

Mr. TYLER. There is no opinion about it. That is the fact.

Mr. KILGORE. Do you mean that if a constructor was drowned before the act of 1886 that he had undergone the same exposure as a naval constructor during the war?

Mr. TYLER. He was not drowned, but he contracted a disease by reason of exposure. He lived four or five months after that exposure; and I do not suppose that the gentleman from Texas denies the fact as stated in the report.

Mr. KILGORE. But the report of the committee is not conclusive with me.

Mr. TYLER. I can understand that; but I think those circumstances are conclusive to the committee here.

Mr. KILGORE. That is hardly prima facie.

Mr. TYLER. I will say that the prima facie statement made by the committee must be accepted unless the gentleman from Texas can deny it.

Mr. TATE. He can deny anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYLER. I know; but he would not deny it. I call the attention of the committee to the facts stated in the report. I assume that the committee in reporting this case was very careful in examining all the evidence before them. It is evidence of record, and there can be no question about the facts as stated; and from those facts the committee has decided that this party is entitled to receive a pension.

Mr. KILGORE. Assuming all the facts to be true, my conclusion is that his widow would have been entitled to be placed on the pension roll under the act of 1866 if he had lived during the war and participated in the dangers and hardships of the war.

Mr. TYLER. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that this officer would very gladly have lived through the war. [Laughter.] It was not the fault of the officer that he did not. It was the fault of the United States Government, in whose employment he was at the time he died and in whose service he was when the exposure occurred which caused his death. It seems to me that it is only an act of justice that the Government should give to his widow the same right that she would have had and which would have been an indefeasible right had he lived six years longer in the service of the country.

Mr. KILGORE. On the same theory, if you carried it to its logical conclusion that it is the fault of the Government, then I am entitled to a pension, although I was on the wrong side in that little performance. [Laughter.] The Government is not to blame for it, but I am to blame. I have relented.

Mr. TYLER. I hope that the gentleman——

Mr. KILGORE (continuing). I am willing to forgive these gentlemen. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYLER. I hope the gentleman will get on the right side to-night and vote for this bill.

Mr. KILGORE. I can not do that.

Mr. TYLER. I think it appeals to the sense of justice and it appeals to the kindly feeling of humanity.

This lady has now reached the age of 63 years. She is an invalid herself, and in very dependent circumstances; and I think this bill appeals especially to this committee.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, if the gentleman will permit me, the observations just made are altogether on the charity side of the question.

Mr. TYLER. I did not understand what the gentleman said.

Mr. KILGORE. I said your observations in behalf of this lady are altogether upon the charity side. Of course, that appeals to everybody. But it is not the business of this Government to dispense charity unless there is some other condition. I say that this would be a wide departure from any rule that has ever existed on which this House has been granting pensions ever since I have been connected with it; and if we should make a departure of this kind we would throw the doors open to a great number of such claims.

Mr. TYLER. I can not see how that could be true, that it will throw open the door to similar claims. How can it be? Do you know of any other naval constructor——

Mr. KILGORE. If you had been here as long as I have, you would have known that there have been plenty of them.

Mr. TYLER. Do you know of any other naval constructor who died anterior to the war from exposure in the service?

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; but they will come here promptly if this is done.

Mr. TYLER. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I am not frightened by shadows or deterred from doing an act of justice because I apprehend somebody will claim and take advantage of my act. But I do not appeal to this committee on the ground of charity. I was appealing to the gentleman from Texas on that ground, because I think he is more easily approachable when we appeal to his charitable nature than when we appeal to his simple sense of justice.

Mr. KILGORE. Yes, sir. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYLER. I hope the committee will report the bill favorably.

Mr. MADDOX. Can the gentleman from Virginia tell us when this act was passed?

Mr. TYLER. This act was passed on the 25th of July, 1866, and this officer died on May 10, 1859.

Mr. MADDOX. Since the passage of that act these naval constructors have become regular officers; they are appointed for a certain specified time, during which they have to serve like any other officers or soldiers, but prior to that time they were merely civilians, and could quit the service of their own free will at any time. Is not that true?

Mr. TYLER. That is true, with certain limitations.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, right there, I think the report of the committee is wrong. The committee base their report in favor of this lady's claim to a pension upon the ground that since the passage of the act of 1866 these naval constructors having become officers their widows would be entitled to pensions in case of their death. But it should be remembered that anterior to the passage of that act they were not officers, and, therefore, they were not nor were their widows entitled to pensions. This man could have quit the service any time he pleased.

Mr. TYLER. But the fact is that he did not quit the service. He died in the service and in the line of duty. I consider that he died as much in the line of duty as if he had been shot by an enemy, as if he had lived four years longer and had been killed in the civil war. Anterior to the passage of the act of 1866 his widow, if he had died, would not have been entitled to a pension, and in order to give her one it would have been necessary to have had a special act, as it is now.

Mr. MADDOX. Suppose a postmaster had been drowned on that occasion?

Mr. TYLER. Well, if an act of Congress six years afterwards had placed postmasters upon the same footing with the officers of the Army or of the Navy, I think that the widow of a postmaster who died in the performance of his duty anterior to the passage of that act would have been entitled to a pension, as I claim this lady is.

Mr. MADDOX. In other words, you say that this law ought to be retroactive.

Mr. TYLER. The object of this is that it shall be retroactive, except that the person who is to be the recipient of the pension is alive now and that she is the widow of one who was in the employ of the Government in the United States Navy, and who, if he had lived, would have been an officer of the Navy with the rank of captain.

If this man had lived until 1865, had served the United States Government through the war, and had returned from that service covered with wounds, as a civil employé he would not have been, nor, in case of his death, would his widow have been, entitled to a pension prior to the act of 1866; yet I have no doubt that if a special bill had been presented in this House to grant her a pension, it would have passed without a dissenting voice if her husband had shared in any of the battles of the war. It seems to me that the reason objection is made to this is because it happens to be an antebellum pension, but surely you have enough pensions arising out of the civil war, and why is it you object now to giving a pension to the widow of a man who, if he were alive to-day, would be a naval officer?

Mr. MADDOX. My objection is the precedent you are about to set. How many people are there engaged in the navy-yards, or employed in connection with the Navy, but who are not enlisted in the service, to whom we might be required to give pensions on the same principle? There might be thousands and tens of thousands of them. Every person who worked in a ship or in a navy-yard might claim a pension if the doors were thrown open in this manner.

Mr. TYLER. The gentleman is allowing his imagination, or his desire for argument, to get ahead of the facts in this case. This bill applies only to a particular grade, that of naval constructor. These naval constructors are not numerous; they are not as thick as blackberries; you do not find them everywhere. You find only one in a yard.

Mr. MADDOX. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. TYLER. This man, if he were alive now, would be hard upon 70 years of age. He died in the service in 1859. I can not conceive that any other such case is likely to arise.

Mr. MADDOX. Let me tell the gentleman that if we pass this bill he will probably find that they are more numerous than he thinks.

Mr. TYLER. Possibly; but sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, do I understand that there is an amendment before the committee, or is the question on the bill as originally presented?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment, as I understand the introducer of the bill is opposed to it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Then, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill, radically opposed to it, for several reasons. I think the reason assigned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MADDOX] is a very substantial one indeed, and a good reason why this bill should be rejected by this committee.

But, apart from that fact, this bill is reported to this House to grant this widow a pension of $30 a month. Naval constructors who served during the entire war are not granted at this time pensions of that amount unless they rank equal to captains. I do not understand that even the naval constructors who served during the war, or their widows, are entitled to a pension of $30. There are some, it is true, who attain a high position as naval constructors—some who rank as captains and others as lieutenants. In such cases, where the men served during the war and were injured or incurred disabilities, the man or his widow is entitled to but $20.

A MEMBER. Twenty-five dollars.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. As low as $20 in some cases—from $20 to $30. Where the naval constructor ranked as a commander, which is a rank below captain, the pension is $25; where he ranked as lieutenant the pension is $20. But that law with reference to naval constructors was enacted for the very reason assigned by the gentleman from Texas: that those men were necessarily compelled during the war to go along with the naval forces in order to superintend the repairs of vessels while in active engagement. Before that time naval constructors were simply ship carpenters—mere civilians, as much so as postmasters. For that reason I am opposed to this bill.

Mr. TYLER. Mr. Chairman, there is no dispute about the fact that this person was a civil employé of the Government at the time of his death. But I assume, and I think I have a right to assume, that the naval constructor of a decade or three decades ago was as necessary to the service of the United States as such an officer is to-day; that it was as great an honor then to be a good naval constructor, performing faithful duty in that line, as it is to-day. I conceive that if this man had lived up to the time of the war, had served through the war, and had died in 1865, his widow would have been entitled to a pension, even though he had not served in the naval forces of the United States. But in 1866 this law was passed placing naval constructors upon the same level with naval officers; and the only reason, as I understand——

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. That was done only on the theory assigned by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. TYLER. In reference to the proposed amount of the pension—$30 per month—I will say that the committee have reported this amount because they recognized the claim of this widow to stand in the same position in which she would have stood had her husband survived the year 1866. He was a full naval constructor; he would have ranked as a captain in the Navy; and would have been entitled, as I understand, under the act of 1866 to a pension of $30 per month. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. TAYLOR] objects to this bill on the ground that the amount allowed is excessive, I should be very glad if he would tell me what would be a proper amount.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I would be in favor of allowing this lady, from considerations of charity simply, the amount designated in the amendment of the chairman of the committee—the same amount allowed other widows—$8 or $12 per month.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I have not said anything thus far in this debate, because this report was adopted at a committee meeting when I was not present. I asked my friend on the committee to say something about it, because I understood he was there. But I believe this bill is a just one. Here is an old woman 63 years of age whose husband died in the line of duty, performing the same obligations to the Government that the husbands of younger widows performed—widows who are now receiving $30 per month.

As to the suggestion in regard to the law passed in 1866, I will say that it was amended in 1871, and to-day if a naval constructor attains the age of 35 years, and if he meets his death in the line of duty, though he may never have been engaged in war, the United States Government gives his widow a pension of $30 a month.

What are the facts here? The husband of this old woman performed forty years ago the identical duty that has since then been performed by younger men whose widows are receiving pensions. For many years she has fought the battles of life alone. The testimony is that she was left with eight little children to support and without a single dollar. Gentlemen here are willing to give younger widows $30 a month; would they deny a small pittance to this old woman whose husband performed equally faithful duty?

Mr. STALLINGS. If her husband died in 1859, has she eight small children now?

Mr. MOSES. I said she was left with eight little children.

Mr. STALLINGS. They are grown now.

Mr. MOSES. Of course they are. And it is an honor to her that she has never come here before asking a pension. I am not here especially to defend this bill. When it was first read I was opposed to it; but on looking into the facts I believe it is a just bill and ought to pass.

I am willing to yield for any question that any member wishes to ask me about it. We are now giving $30 per month to young widows whose husbands have performed military or naval service, and who have died since the war; and yet we can not give this old woman, who was left in penury and want in 1859, even eight, ten, or twelve dollars per month. I proposed an amendment of $12 per month, because I thought she ought to have something; and rather than see the bill fall entirely, I was willing to strike out "thirty" and insert "twelve." If the gentleman will allow me, I believe I will offer that amendment now.

Mr. MEREDITH. Let it go at thirty. The others get that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two. Were the wives of officers of the regular Army drawing pensions then? Were Mexican soldiers pensioned then?

Mr. MOSES. They are drawing pensions now.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is not the question. Was anybody drawing pensions in 1859?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes; when they died in the service.

Mr. MOSES. Not these naval constructors.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mexican soldiers themselves could not draw pensions in 1859.

Mr. MOSES. What has that got to do with granting this old woman a pension now?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. From a charitable standpoint it has nothing to do with it; but the gentleman says this would be an act of justice. He must make a discrimination between justice and charity.

Mr. MOSES. Did not her husband hold the same rank?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. He held no rank at all then.

Mr. MOSES. As a matter of fact, as to the service performed, did he not perform the same service, and did he not die in the line of duty, while in the service of his Government?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is not the question. The question I ask my colleague is, did he have any rank anywhere at that time? Why of course he had not. Was he entitled to anything under the law? Of course he was not.

Mr. MOSES. That is the reason why we bring in a special bill. It is the equity in these cases that we consider, and the equity in this case is all upon the side of the woman.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MOSES. Yes.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Suppose this naval constructor had been an officer of the Navy at the time he died, would he have been entitled to any pension? I understand that Mexican soldiers were not granted any pension then.

Mr. MOSES. Pensions were granted in 1866.

Mr. TYLER. The widow of a captain dying before the war would have been entitled to a pension now.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Would she at that time?

Mr. TYLER. Not at that time; but she would now.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If we open the door to pension this widow, ought we not to pension every widow of every soldier in the regular Army who died between 1846 and 1860?

Mr. MOSES. I am ready to pension any widow of any soldier who died for his country in any war of the United States.

Mr. NORTHWAY. So am I.

Mr. SWANSON. Are not all these private bills introduced for the purpose of doing equity where a person can not come in under the general law?

Mr. NORTHWAY. Yes; but——

Mr. SWANSON. I have never seen one private bill introduced yet which was not introduced for the purpose of doing equity.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Very well——

Mr. SWANSON. What difference does it make whether a man died since 1866 or before, provided he died in the service of this Government? Is not one entitled to a pension as well as the other? These private bills are introduced here to equalize such matters. Here is a bill to give the same right to this woman, whose husband died before 1866, as you give under the general law to the widows of men who died since 1866. Every private pension bill introduced here is introduced with the view of giving some person who could not come in under the general law the same right that others enjoy under the general law. I say this is a case of the same kind and character. If you have a general statute to allow pensions to widows of men who died since 1866, and there are one or two cases of persons who died before 1866 under precisely similar circumstances—I say if you are going to equalize things of that kind, this is a case where it should be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, in explanation of the question, I want to say that I agree with everyone here who would pension in the largest degree possible the widows of soldiers who died in the service. I would equalize all cases. If there is any general law applying to a class of individuals, and there is an exception which applies to one person, I would remove that exception and bring it into that class.

Mr. SWANSON. Why is not this just such a case?

Mr. NORTHWAY. If there had been any law pensioning soldiers or sailors in the regular Army from 1846 down to 1862, if there had been any bar to this widow, anything that would take her out of the class, I would be willing to remove that and put her into the general class.

But you pension her and you do by her what we are not doing by any other officer who died at that time and left a widow. If her husband had been in the Navy at that time and had died she would not be entitled to any pension at all at that time.

Mr. SWANSON. Suppose her husband had lived until 1867, as a naval constructor, would she not have been entitled to a pension? He would have been very glad to have lived.

Mr. NORTHWAY. If you give this widow a pension, it would compel you to pension all the widows of soldiers and officers of the Army during those periods; and unless we do that I do not see why we should make the exception.

Mr. SWANSON. Is not the difficulty this: The present law specifies that if he died and had not performed services his widow should not receive pension; but if he had performed services that we pension for the services performed, and not for the date of them? This man performed the same services that would apply to the general service. Do you not pension for the services performed; and if you do why should you be so technical as to apply it to the date of the death?

Mr. NORTHWAY. If we pension this widow, let us pass a general law to pension all widows prior to the war.

Mr. SWANSON. To pension the widows of all naval constructors?

Mr. NORTHWAY. To pension the widows of all officers of the regular Army.

Mr. SWANSON. That objection would apply to every special pension case you have here every Friday night. You pass those bills because of some special cause; and then when we reach a case of that kind, you gentlemen say that we ought to have a general statute.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I had the floor, and I did not yield to the gentleman to make a speech. This is my idea: If we take this widow and pension her because her husband died in the service, not in battle, but in time of peace; then why should we not pension the widows of all officers and soldiers who died at that time, on the same ground?

Mr. SWANSON. You do provide for all who died since 1866, regardless of what service was rendered.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Why should we pension all who died before that time? Now, I say this: If we should pension this widow, and I am not saying we should not do it, we should pass a general statute pensioning the widows of all the officers and soldiers who died during any of those years. We should have a general statute, so that that could be applied to all who were applicants for pension under such conditions.

Mr. KILGORE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana, chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, his view of this bill coming from his committee?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, this bill does not come from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. What is your view, is what he asked.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It comes from the Committee on Pensions, of which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MOSES] is chairman.

Mr. KILGORE. Ah!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PICKLER. There is one point which I think has hardly been sufficiently stated. It is this: If this naval constructor had died in 1866, his widow would have been entitled to a pension. I am not expressing any opinion upon this case. We do not legislate anybody into the service in order to give their widows a pension. You see how difficult it is for militiamen to obtain pensions; men who fought. You see how difficult it is to get pensions for them unless the militiamen were injured or killed in battle. I simply wish to call attention to that fact.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Another point in this case is this: If this widow is allowed to receive a pension it seems to me that it will open the doors very wide, and then we will have to go back and pension the widows of all the postmasters and the widows of men engaged in any kind of work for the United States.

A MEMBER. And of Congressmen.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. And the widows of Congressmen, and everything of that sort. It would open the door very wide; and a bill of this kind ought not to pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. STALLINGS. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 21, noes 30.

So the motion was rejected.

JOHN I. PATMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5111) for the relief of John I. Patman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the roll of Capt. William U. Anderson, Maj. James Wood's Battalion of Georgia Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1836, the name of John I. Patman as a private, and recognize his service in said organization from the 10th day of June, 1836, when mustered into service, to the —— day of August, 1836, when mustered out and honorably discharged.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BRETZ). The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on that bill.

Mr. CABANISS. I hope the gentleman will wait till he hears the amendment and the report read.

Mr. KILGORE. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read as set forth in the report printed below.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman make a point of order against the bill?

Mr. KILGORE. My impression is, that the amendment cures the defect that I undertook to reach by the point of order. I understood from the reading of the bill that it provided that this man should be put upon the pension roll by the Secretary of the Interior and have a pension at the rate of $8 a month. If that provision is not in the bill as amended, the point of order would not be well taken, and therefore I do not make it.

Mr. CABANISS. Let the report be read.

The report (by Mr. MOSES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5111) for the relief of John J. Patman, having had the same under consideration, respectfully submit the following report:

Mr. Patman alleges that he served in the Creek war of 1836 in Capt. W. N. Anderson's company, Third Battalion Georgia Volunteers, and his allegations are borne out by the testimony of Capt. Anderson and several comrades. The period of service is shown by these witnesses to have been from June 7 to August 18, 1836.

A search of the records of the War Department fails, however, to show the service, and because of this fact the application for pension under the Indian war act of July 27, 1892, filed by Mr. Patman at the Pension Bureau, was disallowed. There can not, however, be any doubt that the claimant rendered the service, as the testimony of the witnesses above referred to is very direct and positive on this point.

The proof also shows that Mr. Patman is very old, about 80 years, and needy, and in the natural order of things he can not long remain a charge upon the bounty of the Government if the relief prayed for is granted.

The passage of the bill is recommended, with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of John J. Patman, late a private in Capt. William M. Anderson's company, Maj. James Wood's battalion, Georgia Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1836, and allow him a pension rated at $8 per month.

Mr. CABANISS. Mr. Chairman, the facts in favor of this claim are simply these: By the testimony of a comrade who is now drawing a pension, this man served from the date mentioned in the report until he was mustered out at the time mentioned in the report. That fact is established by the testimony of the captain of his company, who is now dead. It appears, however, that when this claimant made application for a pension his name was not found upon the muster roll. That has been explained by the fact that the original roll was destroyed and the copy of it now in the Department omits his name, but there are affidavits to the effect that Capt. Anderson, who, as I have stated, is now dead, made out a roll of his company and had it published, giving a history of the company and its members who went from the county where he lived and where this claimant lived, and that this man's name was upon that roll. There is the testimony of a man named Benson that this man was mustered in at the same time that he, Benson, was mustered in, and was mustered out at the same time. There is no doubt, from the proof, that this man performed the service, and the fact that his name is not upon the muster roll is explained as I have stated, but, his name not being upon the roll, he failed to get a pension when he applied for it.

Mr. KILGORE. My understanding from the report is that there is no record in the War Department, or in any Department of the Government, showing that this man served in that Indian war.

Mr. CABANISS. That is true.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, I understand that they propose to account for that by showing that the original muster roll was destroyed and another substituted.

Mr. CABANISS. Yes: and his name is not upon that latter roll.

Mr. KILGORE. The trouble that I apprehend in the matter is that if there is no record, while it may not be the fault of the soldier at all, the absence of such a record has generally been considered conclusive in such cases.

Mr. CABANISS. I have stated that we have the affidavits of his comrades, and also the testimony of his captain.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that, and I understand also that he enlisted from the county in which I was born, which is in his favor. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOSES. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that we have the testimony of his own uncle, who is now drawing a pension, that this man was in the service with him.

Mr. KILGORE. That ought to be mighty good testimony. [Laughter.] I do not dispute the testimony of any of these gentlemen, Capt. Anderson, or Capt. Long, or my uncle, but the trouble is that the absence of a record has been considered conclusive.

Mr. CABANISS. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Texas that if the name was on the roll there would be no necessity for this bill, because the pension would have been granted long ago. We passed a bill similar to this last Friday evening.

Mr. KILGORE. I have no doubt that the proof is sufficient to satisfy a court of equity; but whether it ought to satisfy this House or not I do not know. [Laughter.]

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this bill, from what has been stated here. I believe it is fully established that this man was in the Army and ought to have a pension; but I desire to draw the attention of the committee to the fact that this is precisely parallel with a case which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] objected to awhile ago—the case of a man who served in the last war, but whose name, by reason of a technicality, failed to appear on the muster roll.

Mr. STALLINGS. I will ask the gentleman from South Dakota what the case is he refers to?

Mr. PICKLER. The case you objected to a while ago and which went over.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentlemen are not discussing the bill that is before the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. My point is that in that other case it was shown beyond all doubt that the soldier had been in the service and had died in the service.

Mr. SWANSON. Well, the gentleman from Alabama simply asked to have it go over until a gentleman should be present who could tell us all about it.

Mr. PICKLER. I am in favor of this bill, but I simply call attention to the fact that it is precisely similar to a case which the gentleman from Alabama refused a while ago to permit to go through.

Mr. STALLINGS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CABANISS] a question or two in regard to this case.

Mr. CABANISS. I am ready to answer.

Mr. STALLINGS. The report states:

A search of the records of the War Department falls, however, to show the service, and because of this fact the application for pension under the Indian war act of July 27, 1892, filed by Mr. Patman at the Pension Bureau was disallowed.

Mr. CABANISS. His name was not on the muster roll.

Mr. STALLINGS. Is the name on any roll at the War Department?

Mr. CABANISS. None, so far as I know. I have stated here that the original muster roll was destroyed, and that in making out the copy the name of this man was omitted.

Mr. STALLINGS. Does the proof show that the original muster roll was destroyed?

Mr. CABANISS. That is my information.

Mr. STALLINGS. Does the gentleman know that to be a fact?

Mr. CABANISS. I do not.

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Chairman, I think a man ought to be consistent about these matters——

Mr. CABANISS. I know this, that the captain of this man's company states that he was in his company and performed this service. I know that one of his comrades now drawing a pension swears (we have his affidavit) that this man was mustered in the identical day that he was, and that he served with him until he was mustered out.

Mr. STALLINGS. I will ask the gentleman to withdraw this case until I can have the opportunity to look into it.

Mr. PICKLER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that he should be consistent in the other direction; let him withdraw his objection to the other bill, and let us pass both. That will be consistent.

Mr. STALLINGS. No, sir; I am stating my objection to this bill.

Mr. CABANISS. If the gentleman wants to defeat the bill, now is as good a time as any other. I decline to withdraw it.

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not desire to make any captious objection to the bill; nor have I stated that I wanted to defeat it. But I do say that before I vote money out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the country I want to know the facts, and I am entitled to know them.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Does my friend from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] think it entirely proper, when the House is considering legislation, to ask an entire Congress to wait until he has personally given attention to a particular bill? If so, it ought to be known and understood.

Mr. STALLINGS. I will say in reply to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS], that many times I have sat here day after day and hour after hour while he made a whole Congress wait on his motions.

A MEMBER. That has nothing to do with the case.

Mr. STALLINGS. But that is an answer to the question of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CURTIS].

Mr. CABANISS. Will the gentleman allow me to read a portion of this report?

Mr. STALLINGS. Certainly.

Mr. CABANISS (reading):

A search of the records of the War Department falls, however, to show the service, and because of this fact the application for pension under the Indian war act of July 27, 1892, filed by Mr. Patman at the Pension Bureau was disallowed. There can not, however, be any doubt that the claimant rendered the service, as the testimony of the witnesses above referred to is very direct and positive on this point.

Now, if the gentleman from Alabama thinks that by going through the records and making a search he can find the name of this man, I shall be very glad to have him do so. But such a search has already been made. The application for this pension was filed. The name of this man was not found on the muster roll and therefore the claim was disallowed. Now, the only way to do him justice is in the way here proposed—to allow him to make proof that he performed the service, and explain the reason why his name is not on the muster roll.

Mr. STALLINGS. Where are the proofs to which the gentleman refers—the affidavits?

Mr. MOSES. We have just sent to the committee room for some of the affidavits. If the gentleman will allow me, I think I can clear up this matter in his mind.

Mr. STALLINGS. One moment. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CABANISS] whether he knows either of the parties who make affidavit here.

Mr. CABANISS. I do not. But I think the chairman of the Committee on Pensions [Mr. MOSES] does. The claim comes from a different part of the State from that where I reside; and I do not know any of the parties.

Mr. STALLINGS (to Mr. MOSES). Now I will yield for your question.

Mr. MOSES. I thought you wanted me to make some explanation.

Mr. STALLINGS. I thought you wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. CABANISS. I will say, upon reflection, to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] that I know one or two of the men who make affidavit; they state they had heard Capt. Anderson say that this man had rendered service, and also that Capt. Anderson, in publishing a history of the county of Coweta, gave the muster roll of this company, and in that muster roll, as published by Capt. Anderson, was included this man's name. And I know Capt. Anderson to have been a gallant and truthful gentleman.

Mr. STALLINGS. The gentleman is too good a lawyer to bring hearsay proof before this House and ask us upon it to take money out of the Treasury.

Mr. CABANISS. I understand that a court of law would not receive these affidavits; but Capt. Anderson being dead, the best evidence we can get is the evidence of those who knew what he said and what were his acts in regard to this matter.

Mr. MOSES. If our committee can ever report properly a bill for a case not covered by the general law, this is such a case. As to the suggestion in regard to reporting bills upon hearsay evidence, I will state we make no reports except upon testimony which would be accepted in a court of justice.

Mr. STALLINGS. I did not make the statement that the committee made their report on hearsay evidence. I said the gentleman's present statement was hearsay.

Mr. CABANISS. Upon reflection, I think it would be admissible in a court of law, Capt. Anderson being dead.

Mr. STALLINGS. I find we differ on the question of the admissibility of the evidence.

Mr. MOSES. We have the sworn affidavits of the captain of the company, Capt. William U. Anderson, who has been dead for three years; but before he died this gentleman was making an application for additional land warrants, and we have on file the sworn affidavits of Capt. Anderson that this soldier was in his company. We have the affidavits of four of the soldiers who served in that same company, who are now living in my town, all gentlemen whose word no one could successfully question. They all swear that Mr. Patman served throughout that war with them in the same company. Yet his name does not appear upon the records. We know that these old records are very imperfect. Just a few days ago we passed a bill——

Mr. STALLINGS. I understood the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CABANISS] to say that the record was destroyed. I understand my friend [Mr. MOSES] to say that the records are there, but that this man's name does not appear upon them.

Mr. MOSES. Copies of the record are there, but the son of Capt. Anderson testifies that his father lost the original record.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. You mean the muster roll.

Mr. MOSES. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Are these other soldiers, whose affidavits you have, drawing pensions?

Mr. MOSES. They themselves are drawing pensions, and they are all wealthy men compared with this man. He is a poor man.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Were they in the same company with him?

Mr. MOSES. In the same company with him.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. And they are drawing pensions?

Mr. MOSES. Yes.

Mr. STALLINGS. And they swear that he was with them in the war all the time.

Mr. MOSES. Just the other day there came up the case of a man who distinguished himself as a general in the Revolutionary war, and in whose honor they have just completed a monument up in Massachusetts, and yet his name can not be found upon the muster roll. It is not conclusive evidence that a soldier did not render service simply because his name does not appear upon those rolls.

Mr. STALLINGS. That is not the reason they built the monument, though.

Mr. MOSES. But in a case of this kind, where we have the direct proof from soldiers who served in the same company and knew of the service, our committee thought it nothing but just that the bill should be favorably reported.

Mr. MEREDITH. Every man's testimony is supposed to be true until it is contradicted.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say to my friend from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] that this case is simply this: The name has been for some cause omitted from the records of the War Department, but I hold in my hand the testimony—an affidavit by his captain, an affidavit by Robert L. Long, and other affidavits—and I want to say that these men are to-day known to be truthful honest men in Georgia.

Mr. STALLINGS. Will the gentleman read those affidavits?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. They are long.

Mr. STALLINGS. Just enough of them to show the facts.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say that these men swear he was in their company, and served there, and was honorably discharged.

Mr. STALLINGS. That is their testimony?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Yes, and that ought to be enough.

Mr. Chairman, we have had cases of soldiers who served in the war of the rebellion, the Mexican war, and in the Indian wars, and once in a while you will find a man who served, but whose name is not on the records of the War Department. When they come before this House and make such proof as this, they are always pensioned. I hope no objection will be made. This man is as clearly entitled to a pension as Gen. Grant, or anybody else who served the United States Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be amended to comply with the suggestion of the committee.

There was no objection.

THANKFUL ROBBINS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4780) for the relief of Thankful Robbins.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thankful Robbins, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month, as the foster mother of George E. Squires, late private Company C, One hundred and twelfth New York Volunteers.

Mr. STALLINGS. Let the report be read, Mr. Chairman.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 4780) to pension Thankful Robbins, and submit the following report:

The petitioner alleges that she is the foster mother of George E. Squires, who is shown by the records of the War Department to have enlisted in Company C, Twelfth New York Volunteers, on July 3, 1862, and to have died in service, of dysentery, February 26, 1863.

The petitioner testifies that her first husband was Nathan C. Smith, who died February 2, 1871; she married her present husband, Ralph Robbins, on January 5, 1874; he is a cripple, having lost the use of one arm, and is 78 years old; that they have no property from which to derive a support and are dependent on charity; that in 1846 she and her then husband adopted the soldier, then a boy 2 years of age, who was the illegitimate son of Amanda Smith and Leander Squires, both of whom are dead; that the boy was treated in all respects as their child until his enlistment, and after death was sent home and buried by them; that he was never married and had no children. The truth of this statement is certified to by five witnesses under oath.

It thus appears that the petitioner remarried some years after the soldier's death, but since the above was written her husband, Ralph Robbins, has died, as certified to by Mr. HOOKER of New York, a member of this House, who also certifies to the extreme destitution of the petitioner and her personal worth.

Your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass, and that the title be amended so as to read, "A bill to pension Thankful Robbins."

Mr. STALLINGS. I would like to know who introduced the bill.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I introduced the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STALLINGS. I understood the gentleman from New York was going to make a statement.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. I did not understand that the gentleman cared to have a statement.

Mr. STALLINGS. We can not hear the report very well, and I should like to hear a statement.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. Then I will make a short statement. The soldier was George E. Squires, and he was the illegitimate son of Amanda and Leander Squires. The boy was adopted by this claimant, Thankful Robbins, and her then husband, Nathan Smith, when he was 2 years of age. They treated him in all respects as their own child until he enlisted. He enlisted and died in the service, and they brought him home and gave him a decent and respectable burial. After that time this claimant's husband, who was Nathan H. C. Smith, died, and she remained a widow for some years. Subsequently she remarried Ralph Robbins, who has since died, and this is the foster mother of this boy. She is in dependent circumstances, has no property, and the father and mother of the soldier are both dead. I think that this is really a meritorious case.

Mr. STALLINGS. Is it the widow that the pension is sought for here?

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No; the foster mother.

Mr. HOOKER of New York. The foster mother.

Mr. STALLINGS. Has she got a husband?

Mr. HOOKER of New York. No; she is a widow.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

CORNELIA DE PEYSTER BLACK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3156) granting a pension to Cornelia De Peyster Black, widow of Henry M. Black, late colonel of United States Army, deceased.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE] not to have this bill called up for the present. I do not think he is here, and I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CALEB HUSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5735) to remove the political disabilities of Caleb Huse.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, two-thirds of the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring therein, all political disabilities imposed upon and incurred by Caleb Huse, formerly of the State of Alabama and now of the State of New York, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, be, and are hereby, removed.

Mr. LANE. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. WHEELER of Alabama) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5735) to remove the political disabilities incurred by Caleb Huse, formerly of the State of Alabama and now of the State of New York, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, submit the following report:

The committee find that Caleb Huse was a distinguished graduate of the Military Academy at West Point, and was for many years assistant professor of chemistry, mineralogy, and geology at that institution. He afterwards was solicited to accept a position as professor of chemistry and commandant of cadets at the University of Alabama, and was elected to that office without application on his part. To accept the professorship he resigned his commission in the Army at a time when secession had not been considered. Prof. Huse occupied the position in the University of Alabama for a long time in a manner very acceptable to the people and very creditable to himself.

While engaged in this peaceful duty of educator Prof. Huse was appointed, without any application on his part, a captain of artillery in the Confederate army, and again, without application or knowledge that such a thing was contemplated, he received orders to proceed to Europe to purchase arms and ammunition, but after reaching his destination his former orders were revoked and he was instructed to do whatever might seem proper and advantageous to the Confederate government, bearing in mind the magnitude of the struggle and the impossibility of communicating with the war department directly. Under these instructions Capt. Huse bought and chartered ships, purchased small arms and batteries of artillery, procured clothing, boots, and shoes, blankets, medical supplies, surgical instruments, field hospital cases, artillery harness, ammunition, and the almost innumerable articles required for an army in time of war.

The integrity, good judgment, skill, and diplomacy shown by Capt. Huse won for him the very highest commendation. After spending millions upon millions of dollars, without check or supervision, he was compelled, at the close of the war, to borrow money to pay his passage back to the United States.

In all the work of Capt. Huse he was constantly in contact with men who were engaged in speculations, and the fact that this graduate of West Point devoted all his talents and energies to his duties, and did not allow himself to be influenced in the least by his surroundings is a characteristic which has almost always been found in graduates of the Academy.

The committee report back the bill and recommend that it do pass.

Mr. LANE. I raise the point of order upon the bill. I do not think we have jurisdiction of this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:

The House shall, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, which evening session shall be devoted to the consideration of private pension bills reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KILGORE. Do I understand that this is a proposition to pension a Confederate captain? [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. It is to forgive one.

Mr. HULICK. Would you vote for it if it was?

Mr. KILGORE. I do not think I would.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I would like to inquire if there is anything in the bill or report to show that this gentleman has asked to have his political disabilities removed. I believe it is a condition-precedent that he shall; and it does not show that he has asked for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands there is nothing in the bill to show that that is the fact. The question is on laying aside the bill.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, as it is not shown that the gentleman has asked to have his political disabilities removed, I move that this bill be laid aside without prejudice until somebody can show that. The gentleman who introduced the bill [Mr. WHEELER of Alabama] does not seem to be present. I do not wish to do the gentleman any injustice, but that is a condition-precedent in these cases under the law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. He certainly ought to be required to ask for it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That should be shown, and I therefore move that the bill be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, this committee can only report it to the House, if the committee has jurisdiction of it at all. It does not involve any expenditure of money, and I think the only way it could be done is to take it up in the House on a Friday-night session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very clear that the committee has jurisdiction of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. The House in its Friday-night sessions has jurisdiction of the bill, but the Committee of the Whole only has jurisdiction of those bills which carry appropriations of money, and this bill does not carry any appropriation. I think the question as to whether it should be considered in Committee of the Whole is open to a point of order. I think we can only reach it after the committee rises. Then it would be in the power of the House to take it up and consider it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Texas will permit, the Chair will state that this bill is in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, are we through with this bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LUCINDA C. WHEELER.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to House bill 1463. That is the case where the report says:

The records of the Surgeon-General's Office do, however, show that J. Wheeler, of Company E, Seventh Tennessee Cavalry, died September 16, 1864, at Andersonville, Ga., of scorbutus.

Numerous affidavits on file in the Pension Bureau show that John H. Wheeler was enrolled and sworn in by Capt. T. P. Gray for Company L, but that these men were all captured before the company was filled so as to be mustered in. This, together with the record of death at Andersonville, leave no doubt that the petitioner's husband met his death as claimed, and as a result of his connection with the military service of the United States. It is clear that the deceased was not a member of Company E, and it is reasonably clear that he enlisted for Company L, as stated in the bill.

Since the passage of the bill of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CABANISS], I understand that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] will not further insist on his objection to this bill, and I ask unanimous consent that we return to it and take it up.

Mr. TATE. Is that your bill?

Mr. PICKLER. No, sir.

Mr. TATE. Well, I must object if it is not the gentleman's bill.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not know why there should be any discrimination made between soldiers of these two wars. Moreover, this case comes from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I do not see why there should be any discrimination made between the two pension committees.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. STALLINGS. I will say to the gentleman that there is this difference. Before I gave my consent awhile ago to the passage of the bill of the gentleman from Georgia, he sent down and got the sworn testimony of witnesses that they knew the man, claimant, and knew the facts. Now, let the gentleman do the same in this case——

Mr. PICKLER. Oh, there are numerous affidavits on file in this case.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded. The Clerk will report the next bill.

LOUISA M. SIPPELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 6076) to repeal the special act granting a pension to Louisa M. Sippell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act granting a pension to Louisa M. Sippell, widow of William E. Sippell, of Company H, Thirteenth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry," approved September 29, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Let us have the report read.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom were referred certain papers and documents in relation to the special act approved September 29, 1890, granting a pension to Louisa M. Sippell, have had the same under consideration and submit the following report to accompany the bill herewith presented:

The papers in this case were submitted to this committee during the Fifty-second Congress, and a bill to repeal the act by which pension was allowed to Mrs. Sippell was reported by that committee, but no action was had by the House. Payment of pension was suspended November 16, 1892, pending action by Congress, and the papers have been again submitted by the Department for consideration.

The then Commissioner of Pensions, Hon. Green B. Raum, stated on December 9, 1892:

"The fact having been developed that the claim was fraudulent, and that Louisa M. was never the lawful wife or widow of the soldier, the case is submitted for your consideration, under the provisions of section 4720 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. The full facts relative to the matter will be found in the accompanying letter of the chief of the law division."

The facts as set forth by the chief of the law division of the Pension Bureau are as follows:

"The claimant, Louisa M., has been pensioned by special act of Congress, No. 757. The evidence conclusively shows that on the 7th of February, 1873, soldier had been previously and properly married to Mary C. Milburn, in Jersey City, N. J. Both claimants are now living. The pensioner, Louisa, was married to the soldier in New York City on the 29th of January, 1880. It further appears that the second wife, Mary C., has remarried, at least at common law, in all probability several times since she separated from the soldier.

The evidence further shows that the pensioner, Louisa M., is not amenable to the provisions of section 4720, Revised Statutes of the United States, so far as any actual prosecution for the filing of a false and fraudulent claim is concerned, because she was not sufficiently cognizant of the soldier's previous matrimonial experience. On page 11 of Special Examiner Brown's report, Mary C. states that she believed that the soldier was dead in 1885, and that she had a right to remarry. It appears, of course, that the soldier did not die until October of the same year, but this statement will be a subject for further consideration.

"On the 23d of March, 1885, Mary C. remarried. She left the soldier in December, 1876, and never saw him again after that date. It is gathered from the evidence secured on special examination subject to the reference of December 1, 1891, of this case to the board of review, that the pensioner, Louisa, had every opportunity of knowing, and without doubt did know, that the soldier had a living, undivorced wife; and, further, that her remarriage to him was a result of illicit intercourse previous to the date of actual marriage. It does not appear that the soldier was unaware of the whereabouts of his former wife, Mary C., and therefore no justification for remarriage under the laws of the State of New York ever arose.

"It is apparent from the foregoing statement, and for the reason therein cited, that soldier was never justified in contracting a third marriage; i. e., with the pensioner. The soldier's first wife, Alice Decker, had been divorced from the soldier, and the soldier's marriage to Louisa M. was unquestionably lawful at its inception; and his remarriage to Louisa M. was unlawful, because he had never been divorced from Mary C., and no reason arose, under the laws of either the State of New Jersey or the State of New York, by which remarriage without divorce from Mary C., the second wife, would be justifiable. The laws of New Jersey do not permit a remarriage upon presumption of death.

"It may, therefore, be accepted that Louisa M. was never the lawful wife, and consequently never the lawful widow, of the soldier, and of course she never should have been pensioned as the soldier's widow."

The Assistant Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Cyrus Bussey, on January 5, 1893, gave the following opinion:

"It is clear from the foregoing that pensioner's marriage to the soldier was void, as he had a former wife living from whom he was never divorced, and you (the Commissioner of Pensions) properly suspended payment of her pension and reported the case to Congress for consideration under said section 4720, Revised Statutes, and nothing further remains for this Department to consider until Congress shall have acted in the matter. I am of the opinion that neither your Bureau nor this Department has power to drop pensioner's name from the rolls until so authorized by Congress in the repeal of the act granting the pension."

In view of the facts above set forth, your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend that it do pass.

For the further information of the House the report of the Fifty-first Congress, on which the special act was originally passed, and showing that the question of the legality of the marriage was not before the committee, and that the so-called widow admitted her inability to prove clearly that the soldier's death was a result of his Army service, is here appended.

[House Report No. 1541, Fifty-first Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 7338) granting a pension to Louisa M. Sippell, submit the following report:

That the claimant is the widow of William E. Sippell, late a private in Company H, Tenth New Jersey Volunteer Infantry; that he was severely wounded in action in July, 1864, being struck by a rifle ball in the thigh, the ball splintering the bone and remaining in the leg; that he was in hospital fourteen months and thereafter was ever disabled; that in 1879 he submitted to an operation by which the ball was removed from his leg, and, the wound healing, there was no further discharge; that thereafter his lungs were affected and general health impaired. He grew worse until 1885, when he was admitted to hospital in Jersey City, where, in that year, he died from lung disease and affection of the brain, induced by blood-poisoning, the result of his wound.

The deceased was a pensioner, and his continuance of disability is shown by the testimony of Edward Hofner and John W. Rieber. The claimant admits she is unable to furnish medical testimony as to cause of death owing to death of attending physician, but swears said physician said her husband died from insanity and blood-poisoning, caused by wound, and Edward Le Court, a competent witness, testifies to similar statement of physician.

In view of the foregoing your committee are of the opinion that claimant's husband's death was a result of his army service, and recommend the bill do pass.

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Chairman, I believe this woman was pensioned by a special act of Congress, was she not?

A MEMBER. Yes.

Mr. STALLINGS. Well, I just want to suggest to the committee that we ought to be more careful about these matters when we see how such bills get through here.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee reporting this bill whether this woman knows of the contemplated action of the House, or whether she has had an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes, sir. This is the result of a special investigation.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Did she know of the special investigation?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes, sir; I think she had notice of it.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Has she ever appeared to defend herself in any way?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Never.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS], who speaks of the necessity of being careful, that the question of marriage was not raised in these cases in the Fifty-first Congress when that bill was passed, and this repeal bill is recommended upon the ground that this woman is not really the soldier's widow.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I will state that a similar report to this was made in the Fifty-second Congress, but was not reached.

Mr. JONES. Does the gentleman know who introduced the bill in the Fifty-first Congress pensioning this woman, or whether any statement was made as to the merits of the case at that time?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I do not know.

Mr. STALLINGS. Who was chairman of the Committee on Invalid pensions at that time?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Maj. Morrill, a very honorable gentleman.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HANNAH WELCH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 1214) granting a pension to Hannah Welch.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act of June 27, 1890, the name of Hannah Welch, widow of William Welch, late musician of Third Rhode Island Heavy Artillery.

The report (by Mr. MCETTRICK) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 1214) granting a pension to Hannah Welch, and submit the following report:

The petitioner is, as she believes, the widow of William Welch, who served in the band of Third Regiment Rhode Island Heavy Artillery from August 15, 1861, to August 31, 1862. She applied for pension under the act of June 27, 1890, on August 20, 1890, and her claim was rejected March 15, 1892, on the ground that special examination fails to prove conclusively the fact that the soldier is dead.

The evidence shows that the soldier left home, Valley Falls, R. I., in 1871. Two letters from him were received by his wife soon after. No further news was received until 1873 or 1874, when a letter was received by the postmaster at Central Falls stating that a William Welch, believed to have friends at Central Falls, had died, and asked that his friends be notified. The name of the city where he was believed to have died has been forgotten, but it is believed to have been Detroit, Mich. Soldier was of consumptive diathesis, and no one of his friends doubts that he is dead.

No application for pension has ever been filed by the soldier. The decision of the Pension Bureau is to the effect that presumption of death would arise after seven years if there was no obstacle to prevent his return, and that two reasons are intimated in this case—one that the soldier was in debt, the other that he was addicted to drink. That the postmaster's letter referred to is not in evidence and is too uncertain as to identity to be accepted as conclusive proof of death.

These are the facts, briefly stated, for and against the presumption of death in this case.

Your committee feel that the absence of twenty-three years, the failure to file a claim for pension, and the cumulative evidence of the alleged letter reporting his death are of such force as to compel the conviction that the soldier is in fact dead, and your committee therefore recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask whether the committee are in possession of any information as to whether this soldier was a deserter or not?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. He never was.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Well, why did he not apply himself for a pension?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. He was dead.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. As I understand, there is no evidence that he is dead except that lost letter. Is there any better or other evidence than that to show his death?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Nothing but the lapse of twenty-three years, during which he has not been heard of. Ordinarily an absence of seven years raises a presumption of death, but this man has not been heard of for twenty-three years.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Had he not a chance to apply for a pension before the time when it is supposed that he died?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina. Why did he not apply within that time?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. The presumption is that the soldier could not have obtained a pension if he had applied. He had no disease contracted in the service, and no wound. This is for his widow. He served over the required time, and had an honorable discharge, and he disappeared, and now, after the lapse of twenty-three years, his widow, who has remained his widow, comes and asks Congress to pass a special bill granting her a pension on the presumption that her husband is dead.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. She asks it under the law of 1890.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand the gentleman from Indiana to say that the soldier himself would not be entitled to a pension if he were alive?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Not that I know of.

Mr. PICKLER. He might be under the act of 1890.

Mr. KILGORE. Now, the theory upon which the Pension Committee has reported this bill is that the soldier is dead.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. How long has he been away?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Twenty-three years.

Mr. KILGORE. That would furnish at common law a sufficient presumption of death.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes; but the Pension Office will not accept that evidence.

Mr. KILGORE. Assuming that this man is dead at common law, will not the Pension Department give his widow a pension?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No, sir; it will not.

Mr. KILGORE. Has the claim been rejected there?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It has.

Mr. KILGORE. Is his record clear as a soldier in the late war?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Yes, sir.

The bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZA HOLMES.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1717) granting a pension to Eliza Holmes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Holmes, widow of John Holmes, deceased, late of Company A, Seventy-ninth Regiment New York Volunteers, and whose pension claim is numbered 13513.

The report [by Mr. HAINES] was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 1717) granting a pension to Eliza Holmes, and submit the following report:

The petitioner, whose address is No. 343 West Seventeenth street, New York City, is the widow of John Holmes, deceased, late a member of Company A, Seventy-ninth New York Volunteers, to whom she was married

September 22, 1890, as shown by the affidavit of the officiating clergyman and other evidence; the fact that she has remained a widow since the soldier's death is also established by satisfactory testimony.

The records of the War Department show that John Holmes enlisted in Company A, Seventy-ninth New York Volunteers, May 13, 1861, and was "found dead in High street, Georgetown, D. C., on the morning of July 2, 1861; deceased had been stabbed by some person or persons unknown."

In an affidavit dated July 20, 1864, William Manson (since deceased), who was captain of soldier's company, testifies that when the regiment left Georgetown, about July 1, 1861, a portion of the regiment was left behind to guard the regiment property; that said Holmes was one of such guard and was on the following day found dead, having been stabbed during the night by some person unknown, and that he was in the performance of his duty at the time of his death.

John H. Sheppard, in affidavit executed September 24, 1885, testifies that he was a comrade of John Holmes, and that they together were placed on guard duty at the Observatory in Georgetown on the morning of July 2, 1861 (probably meaning, however, July 1), and continued on that duty until 8:30 p. m., when they returned to the college and found that the regiment had moved, leaving a guard consisting of Lieut. McNee and about twelve men; the officer told them there was no food for them and gave them permission to go and get something; they went to a grocery store and got some cheese and crackers; while there three men, apparently civilians, used some abusive language toward them, which they did not resent, but left. Holmes, however, decided to go back alone to get something more, and was never seen again alive; next morning affiant learned that Holmes was murdered; he was perfectly sober when he left affiant.

The Georgetown Evening Star of July 2, 1861, contained the following account of the murder:

"John Holmes, a private in Company A, Seventy-ninth New York Regiment, was murdered this morning at an early hour near the corner of High and Water streets. He received two stabs in the left breast. * * * The coroner's inquest is now in progress, and the evidence of those in the neighborhood shows that deceased was, in an altercation with one or two other men, habited in the uniform of his regiment, and from them received the wound that caused his death. * * * Several members of the regiment were arrested, and one is strongly suspected."

The War Department records do not, however, show that any member of the regiment was under arrest for this murder or anything further in the matter.

The widow's claim was rejected on the ground that the soldier's death did not occur in line of duty and she can not be pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, for the reason that the soldier was not honorably discharged from the service.

While the action of the Pension Bureau is doubtless proper, this seems to be just such a case as special acts of Congress are designed to relieve. While it can not be proved that the soldier met his death in line of duty, it is equally true that he died in service and that there is no sufficient reason to assume that it was through any fault of his own that he was murdered.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. KILGORE. As I understand from the reading of the report, this soldier was in the service only a few days.

A MEMBER. Sixty days.

Mr. KILGORE. And he was found dead on the street over here in Georgetown. He seems to have died from a wound inflicted with a knife, as the report says, "by some parties unknown." Now, there is no evidence that he was assassinated. There is no evidence that he was not engaged in an altercation which he might have provoked himself; there is no evidence that the party who killed him may not have killed him in self-defense. There is a "stand off" on all these questions. I can not exactly see how the committee reporting this bill could arrive at the conclusion that this man was assassinated or was killed without fault of his own. That is the only difficulty that occurs to me in this matter. If there can be any satisfactory explanation given by the gentleman who has charge of the bill, I will make no objection to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. The gentleman who introduced this bill, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER], does not appear to be present this evening. But the simple facts in this case are these: This soldier enlisted May 13, 1861. He was found dead on High street, Georgetown, on the morning of July 2, 1861. There does not seem to be a particle of evidence incriminating the soldier himself in any breach of duty. Now, his widow has lived as his widow all these years——

Mr. KILGORE. Are you authorized to assume that this soldier was entirely without fault in this matter, and that he was killed in the line of his duty? Are you authorized to assume that from the facts and circumstances attending the discovery of the man after his death?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Well, I am inclined to think so.

Mr. KILGORE. Might you not just as well assume that there was something wrong about the matter?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I think not. I think he is entitled to the benefit of the presumption in his favor. There is nothing that seems to be proved against him at all. There he is—a dead soldier. Now, what presumption shall we adopt in regard to his case? He is found dead, and there is not a particle of proof against him. The committee felt that under the circumstances they ought to report the bill favorably.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. I understand further that in a Georgetown paper, which is quoted in the report, there is an account of the killing, and it is stated that there was no quarrel, so far as anyone heard, and it was supposed he had been assassinated by some one who crept upon him stealthily. That is the way in which the papers reported it.

Mr. KILGORE. But there is no proof of any motive for such assassination?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. No, sir.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. About that time there was considerable motive existing on the part of a good many. [Laughter.]

Mr. STALLINGS. But those who may be supposed to have had such a motive were on the other side of the river.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. They may have been on both sides.

Mr. JONES. I wish to inquire whether there has ever been an unfavorable report in any Congress on this claim?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Not to my knowledge. It was reported favorably last year.

Mr. JONES. I had an intimation that probably there was an adverse report in this case.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. If there was, I never knew of it.

Mr. STALLINGS. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana to let this case go over until the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] is here. If he has any interest in this bill he will come here and state the facts to the House. There is no use in hurrying these matters. In a case brought to our attention this evening we saw the trouble that sometimes arises from hasty action in these cases.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] has been a very faithful attendant——

Mr. STALLINGS. On these night sessions?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. On these night sessions.

Mr. STALLINGS. Well, let him come here another night. I suggest that the bill be passed over.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. The gentleman ought not to insist upon that.

Mr. STALLINGS. I do not think the bill ought to be passed unless there is a quorum present, to put it plainly.

Mr. DUNPHY. Does the gentleman remember the affidavit of the comrade of the man who was murdered?

Mr. STALLINGS. I heard the reading of it in the report. I think we ought to have more evidence.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying aside the bill with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. STALLINGS. I would suggest to the chairman of the committee to lay it aside until the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] comes. It would be much better.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I do not want any one bill to stand in the road of others, and while I believe this bill ought to be passed to-night, still I will make the request that it be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. STALLINGS. That is a custom that we have here at these night sessions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside without prejudice. If there objection?

There was no objection.

CALEB HUSE.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I understand that where a bill is passed without prejudice, we may return to it. The bill (H. R. 5735) to remove the political disabilities of Caleb Huse was passed over without prejudice, and I ask that the committee return to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] asks unanimous consent that the committee return to the bill that was passed over a few moments ago without prejudice.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. It is simply a bill to remove a disability. It will not take a minute.

Mr. JONES. Is it in order that the party may apply for a pension?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; he will never get a pension.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5735) to remove the political disabilities of Caleb Huse.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I make no objection to that bill, for I take it under the law a man would be entitled to have his disabilities removed if he has been a loyal citizen long enough; but I think I will submit a point of order that a bill of that kind can not be considered in the Committee of the Whole, for the reason that it does not appropriate any money or property and does not provide for the expenditure of any money or property. My idea would be that it could only be considered in the House at a Friday night session. Therefore I submit the proposition to the Chair that the committee would have to rise and go back into the House before a bill of that kind can be considered.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. I am not willing to detain the House, and therefore I will withdraw the bill for the present.

Mr. KILGORE. I am not objecting to its passage.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. If it will cause any delay, I will withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw the bill?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes, if it can be passed over without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TRACEY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill which I hold in my hand.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. Regular order!

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. TRACEY. The gentleman from Indiana informs me that he withdraws his objection. This bill was recognized by the Speaker, but objection was made because it was said that the bill should be considered in the Committee of the Whole. I wish to go out of the city, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. STALLINGS. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

MARY E. TRICKEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1196) to restore Mary E. Trickey and children of Hartwell M. Trickey to the pension roll.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to restore Mary E. Trickey, widow of Hartwell M. Trickey, late of Company I, One hundred and sixth New York Volunteer Infantry, and their children, to the pension rolls as of the date of December 1, 1891.

Mr. KILGORE. I can not understand what the Secretary of War has to do with these pension matters.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there is an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act approved June 27, 1890, the name of Mary E. Trickey, as widow of Hartwell M. Trickey, late of Company I, One hundred and sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to pension Mary E. Trickey."

Mr. KILGORE. Let the report be read, Mr. Chairman.

The report (by Mr. HARE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1196) to pension Mary E. Trickey, have carefully considered the same and submit the following report:

A similar bill was favorably reported in the Fifty-second Congress but failed of passage. The facts shown are as follows:

Hartwell M. Trickey served as a private in Company I, One hundred and sixth New York Infantry, from July 12, 1862, until June 22, 1865. He was pensioned at $4 per month for gunshot wound of left forearm, and died June 11, 1889.

Mary E. Trickey applied for pension as his widow, and proved to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau that she was married to the soldier July 2, 1872, and pension was allowed her under act of June 27, 1890, at $8 per month, plus $2 for each of four children from July 2, 1890. Payment of pension was suspended August 15, 1891, on information tending to show that she was not the legal widow of the soldier, and a special examination was had to determine the facts, which are as follows, as is fully shown by evidence now on file in the Pension Bureau:

The soldier, while at home on furlough, was married November 12, 1863, at Ogdensburg, N. Y., to one Jane Ritchey, and remained with her one or two weeks at that time. Again, after his discharge, he lived with her as his wife for about one and a half years, when he went to Pennsylvania and she did not accompany him, and never afterward did they live together. The reasons for this separation do not appear. This separation seems to have been about 1867. In 1868 the present claimant, Mary E. (Montgomery), met the soldier at Pottsville, Pa., and on July 2, 1872, they were married at Wilkesbarre, Pa., and lived together continuously as man and wife from that time until his death, and they had five children. It appears, however, that the soldier was never divorced from Jane, his first wife, and hence this so-called marriage to Mary E. was not legal. Some two or three years after the separation above referred to Jane commenced to live with one William Rogers, and they had lived and cohabited as man and wife, openly and publicly, since that time, and have a family of four children, one of whom is 20 years of age, and she is commonly known as Jane Rogers. All this is shown by her own admissions and by other evidence.

On November 29, 1890, Jane filed a claim for the accrued pension due the soldier at the date of his death, and although this had already been paid to Mary E., it was determined in the light of all the facts that it must be paid to Jane, as the former payment to Mary E. was illegal; this was accordingly done, and the name of Mary E. was permanently dropped from the rolls. The amount of accrued pension which was thus twice paid seems to have been not more than $13, and possibly not more than $1, if the soldier himself lived to draw the pension for the quarter ending June 4, 1869.

Although it has been determined that Jane was legally entitled to the accrued pension, it does not follow that she is entitled to a continuous pension as widow. It is evident that she has lived as wife with Rogers both before and since the soldier's death, and, even if a common-law marriage does not arise on the death of the former husband, her relations with Rogers are clearly such as to defeat a claim by reason of the act of August 7, 1882, as to open and notorious adulterous cohabitation.

Inasmuch as the object of this bill is to pension the beneficiary as an act of justice rather than of strict legal right, and inasmuch as a considerable sum of money has already been paid her illegally, though, perhaps, through no conscious fault of her own, pension, if allowed, should date from the approval of the act.

Your committee therefore return the bill and recommend that the bill do pass, after being amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act approved June 27, 1890, the name of Mary E. Trickey, as widow of Hartwell M. Trickey, late of Company I, One hundred and sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry."

Also amend the title so as to read, "A bill to pension Mary E. Trickey."

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise. There is evidently not time for the discussion of this bill to-night. In the same connection, I desire to ask unanimous consent that all bills ordered to be favorably reported last Friday night be reported by the chairman of the Committee of the Whole to the House to night.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] asks unanimous consent that the bills ordered to be laid aside with a favorable report last Friday night also be reported to the House to-night with a favorable recommendation.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The motion that the committee rise was then agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I will state that the reason why that was not done last Friday night was because the committee then rose under a call of the House.

The committee accordingly rose, and Mr. BROOKSHIRE having resumed the Chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BRETZ, chairman of the Committee of the Whole, reported that that committee, having had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar, had directed him to report the same to the House with various recommendations. The committee had also directed him to report sundry bills which were considered at the last Friday evening session with various recommendations.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the amendments, the engrossment, and third reading, and the final passage of all the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on this and previous Friday night sessions.

Mr. BAILEY. I would suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that the difficulty about that is, if that order were to be made and any gentleman in the House to-morrow, or any other day until they were disposed of, were to demand the regular order, those bills would displace everything, appropriation bills as well as any other business.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I will make an exception in favor of the appropriation bills.

Mr. BAILEY. We have no power to make exceptions, because if any gentleman demanded the regular order, these bills would have to be called up. There will be ample opportunity, I am sure, for the House to dispose of these bills which the committee have reported; and in view of that objection, I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana that he withdraw that request.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, let me make this suggestion. I think that after so long a time has elapsed, it is only right to make that request; and I make it with the condition that in no case shall this interfere with the regular appropriation bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the previous question be ordered on the amendments, the engrossment, and third reading and final passage of bills reported from the Committee of the Whole at Friday night sessions. Is there objection?

Mr. STALLINGS. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 29 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 24, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally referred as below:

A bill (S. 1637) for the relief of Capt. John W. Pullman—to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 1412) for the relief of Fannie B. Randolph and Dora L. Stark—to the Committee on War Claims.

LIFE-SAVING STATION NEAR GREEN HILL, R. I.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 218) to provide a life-saving station at or near Green Hill, on the coast of South Kingston, in the State of Rhode Island.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Rhode Island for the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. SAYERS. I must object, Mr. Speaker, to the consideration of that bill at the present time.

BRIDGE OVER THE MONONGAHELA.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5356) to authorize the West Braddock Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River, from the borough of Rankin to Mifflin Township.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether this bill has been reported from the committee.

Mr. DALZELL. Yes, sir; it has been reported favorably.

Mr. SAYERS. And it is in the regular form?

Mr. DALZELL. I so understand.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NAVAL CADET FOR SEVENTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Joint resolution directing the Secretary of the Navy to declare a vacancy in the Naval Academy at Annapolis for the Seventh Congressional district of Georgia, and requiring the said Secretary to give notice to the Representative of said district of said vacancy, as now provided by law.

Whereas the law being plain and explicit in its requirements that each and every cadet except those appointed by the President shall be a resident in the district which he represents in the Naval Academy at Annapolis; and

Whereas it appears from the report of the Secretary of the Navy that one George L. P. Stone, of the District of Columbia, has been appointed to represent the Seventh Congressional district of Georgia; and

Whereas said appointment is contrary to law and void by reason thereof: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to declare a vacancy in said Seventh Congressional district of Georgia, and that he give the Representative of said district the usual notice of said vacancy, and that he be allowed until the 1st day of July next to recommend a candidate, as now provided by law, and if said Representative fails or refuses to make a recommendation, that the said Secretary of the Navy be and is hereby directed to appoint a cadet from said district, as now required by law, and that all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith be and the same are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this joint resolution?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia whether the joint resolution has been reported by a committee?

Mr. MADDOX. No, sir. The House has already passed upon the question involved by a simple House resolution.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I remember that some statement was made on this subject the other day. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia whether the passage of this joint resolution will increase the number of cadets at the Naval Academy?

Mr. MADDOX. It will not.

Mr. DINGLEY. It simply declares a vacancy where an appointment has already been made by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman please state the effect fully, in order that we may understand it?

Mr. MADDOX. I will have a letter from the Secretary of the Navy read, which will explain the matter.

The letter was read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 17, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Referring to my conversation this morning, in relation to Naval Cadet George L. P. Stone, who now represents the Seventh district of Georgia, I find from an examination which has been made of the records that the Hon. J. C. Clements, who represented the Seventh district of Georgia on March 5, 1890, was duly notified of a vacancy existing in that district. Mr. Clements on March 31, 1890, nominated Mr. Maxey Dobbs, who was permitted April 1, 1890, and presented himself at the Naval Academy May 15, 1890, but failed to pass the required examination for admission.

On May 28, 1890, Mr. Clements, in accordance with the requirements of section 1516 of the Revised Statutes, was informed of Mr. Dobbs's failure and requested to nominate a candidate. Mr. Clements failed to make the required nomination, and the Hon. Benjamin F. Tracey, Secretary of the Navy, appointed Mr. Stone August 20, 1890, whose residence was in the District of Columbia. Secretary Tracey acted in this matter as his predecessors had done, and as the present Secretary of the Navy did in similar cases last summer.

If the construction which the House would seem to put upon the law by its recent resolution be correct, the appointments made in these cases are void, and if void, it would seem that the courts would have jurisdiction to declare vacancies under proper proceedings. My construction of the law agreed with that of my predecessors, and I therefore followed the precedent set by them.

It is exceedingly important that this disputed question be set at rest, and this can be done in one of two ways, either by the enactment of a law or joint resolution of Congress or by proceedings in courts.

I should be very glad to see the matter finally settled, and if Congress does not act it would seem to me that possibly the courts would have jurisdiction.

Very respectfully,

H. A. HERBERT,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. JOHN W. MADDOX,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. DINGLEY. It appears that that cadet was appointed in 1890, and will have been in the institution about four years at the close of this academic year.

Mr. MADDOX. No, sir; about three years.

Mr. DINGLEY. And it is proposed to dismiss him after he has been in the Academy three years?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, there are other cases similar to this, some of which were alluded to here the other day. The passage of this joint resolution would be a peculiar hardship to this young man, who has been in the institution three years, and it seems to me that, under the circumstances, there ought to be some other method devised of remedying the injustice done to the district concerned.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest to the gentleman from Maine that it is a very great favor for this young man to have received three years' education when he was not entitled to any at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. That may be; but the young man is not to blame. I agree entirely that the appointment ought not to have been made, but it appears that the Representative from the district did not do his duty under the law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But the law required the Secretary of the Navy in that case to appoint a man from the district.

Mr. DINGLEY. Undoubtedly that is the spirit of the law.

Mr. MADDOX. The Representative of the district, Mr. Clements, did make two recommendations.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not know that.

Mr. COOMBS. In time?

Mr. MADDOX. If I may be allowed, I will make a statement in relation to this matter, and in connection with it will have read a letter which I have received from Mr. Clements.

Mr. DINGLEY. It would appear then that the recommendation made by Mr. Clements did not reach the Secretary in time.

Mr. MADDOX. I ask to have Mr. Clements's letter read, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the time of the House ought to be taken up with the reading of that paper. This is a matter which affects so many districts in the United States that it can only be reached by a general bill. So long as we go on with this special legislation on the subject we shall never get a general bill. I therefore object to the consideration of this matter.

Mr. MADDOX. I trust I may be allowed to make a statement.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman will be allowed to make a statement. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, the facts in this case, as I understand, are that Mr. Clements made two nominations, both of which were rejected, the last one about the 1st of July, when his time was out. He went to the Department and pleaded that his time must be extended. The Secretary of the Navy was absent; but Commodore Ramsay, who was there in charge of the Department, told him that his time would be extended until the following March; that is, that he would have till that time to make the appointment. But in August Secretary Tracy appointed Mr. Stone from this District, to represent the district I have now the honor to represent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this House has already declared itself by resolution on this subject. The law is plain; there can be no doubt, it seems to me, in the mind of anyone that this appointment was illegal. More than that, the statute provides that no money apropriated for this institution shall be expended except in strict conformity with the law.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says that the action now proposed would be a hardship upon the young gentleman, Mr. Stone, who has been appointed from this District to represent my district. I do not agree with the gentleman from Maine. I think that this young man has already enjoyed three years, education at this institution which he ought not to have had. If I understand the facts correctly, there are a number of others there in the same condition. I have yet to find a single lawyer who after examining the statute for even a few minutes has had any doubt what the law is in this case. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that this resolution may now pass and that my district may be allowed the right to which it was entitled. In addition to righting the wrong in this case, such a resolution sets a precedent by which the Secretary of the Navy will be guided in the future.

Mr. HOLMAN. The resolution does not propose to increase the aggregate number of cadets?

Mr. MADDOX. No, sir, it does not.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] is in no worse situation than many other members on this floor. As I have already said, I believe that the system which has been adopted by the Secretary of the Navy should be stopped; but it can only be done effectually by enacting, through the action of the two Houses and the approval of the President, a general bill. So long as we go on relieving individual instances in the manner now proposed we shall never adopt such general legislation as ought to be adopted to put a stop to the action of the Secretary of the Navy. I therefore object to the consideration of this resolution.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the resolution, it is not before the House.

Mr. MADDOX. I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection, the resolution will be so referred.

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SICKLES, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence for three days, on account of sickness.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

BRIDGE AT KANSAS CITY.

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back the bill (S. 260) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at the most accessible point between the city of Kansas and the town of Sibley, in the county of Jackson and State of Missouri," approved March 3, 1887; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

House bill No. 1971 (similar in its provisions to Senate bill No. 260) was by unanimous consent laid on the table.

BRIDGE AT RED WING, MINN.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back with amendment the bill (H. R. 6110) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River at Red Wing, Minn.; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HULICK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call up for consideration at this time a bill which has been reported by the Committee on Public Lands and is now on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order now. This is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. HULICK. We have a report with it.

The SPEAKER. If the bill has been previously reported——

Mr. HULICK. It has been ——

The SPEAKER. Then there can be no action taken respecting it during this call, which is simply to enable the committees to make their reports, to be placed on the appropriate Calendars.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The call of committees for reports having been concluded—

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HATCH in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriation for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the first formal reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. KYLE. I am willing to agree to that provided sufficient time is given to discuss the proposition embodied in the bill from which a minority of the committee dissent. It must be remembered that there is a dissenting report here, and I do not want any action taken to deprive the minority of the opportunity of debate on that proposition.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. If the gentleman from Mississippi will allow me, the gentleman from North Carolina proposes, as I understand it (as I had a conversation with him in regard to the matter), that as soon as this was disposed of, whether we read the bill or not, an agreement would be entered into along the line that the gentleman from Mississippi suggests.

Mr. REED. I think we had better go on in the regular way.

Mr. KYLE. If I understand the rules, if this proposition were assented to now, the bill could only be discussed under the five-minute rule, and that would probably cut off debate so far as this proposition of difference is concerned. It is that condition of affairs that induces me to oppose the suggestion.

Mr. BURROWS. But this unanimous consent would not affect the general debate.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. It would not cut off any of the rights the gentleman possesses.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is only seven pages long, and it could have been read by this time. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I will make a brief statement as to this bill.

The estimates on which the bill is based will be found on pages 201 and 202 of the Book of Estimates, amounting to $90,399,485.33, not taking into consideration any estimates for "necessary and special facilities on trunk lines." The amount required for this item for the current year is $193,614.22. If this item had been included in the estimates for 1894, the total sum would be $90,596,099.55.

This bill recommends an appropriation of $87,470,599.55, or $3,125,500 less than the estimates, with the item for "special facilities" included. If that item is not considered, there will still be a net reduction from the official estimates of $2,928,835.78.

The sum recommended by the committee is $3,466,285.33 more than the appropriation for the current fiscal year, which amounted to $84,004,314.22. The estimated postal revenue for the fiscal year 1895, in the opinion of the Postmaster-General, will be $84,427,748.44, or $3,142,851.11 less than the appropriation recommended by the committee.

Now, I will ask unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Before agreeing to the unanimous consent asked by the gentleman, I would like to make one or two inquiries of him.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I find on the first page of the report, from which I believe the gentleman has quoted, that the amounts recommended by the bill now under consideration are $3,125,500 less than the estimates.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Then I find when I turn over further in the report that you recommend for the salaries of postmasters $1,250,000 less than the estimates.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That is true.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I also find that you recommend for the railroad mail transportation $1,400,000 less than the estimates.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Also, that you recommend $94,000 for postal-car service less than the estimates?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. These added together make $2,794,000, leaving $181,000, in round numbers, of a cut on the other estimates than the three I have mentioned?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That, I presume, is correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Now, I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that, as to the salaries of postmasters, and as to the railroad mail transportation, and as to the postal-car service, the law calls for the service, and that it will be rendered in accordance with the law and under the law either with or without an appropriation?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That is true.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And is it not further true that it is as absolutely assured as anything can be in the future that there will be a deficiency to the extent of $2,744,000 for the service on these three items?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois that I suppose there will be some deficiencies; but the deficiency in these several items, in my opinion, will not be near so much as is estimated, and the reason is on account of the general depression of business prevailing throughout the country and the fact that railroads are doing much less business this year than last year and previous years.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman is aware, of course, of the fact that this is an appropriation for a future year, to take effect for the twelve months commencing on the 1st day of July next? Does the gentleman still apprehend that the business depression to which he has alluded will continue and affect the fiscal year for which this bill is prepared in the same way as he has just suggested?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, I will state to the gentleman that so far as the railroads are concerned we have weighings every four years at different periods of time in different parts of the country. The weighings of the mail for last year will not be changed probably for four years, and for the year before for four years from that time; and one reason for the proposed reduction here is on account of the fact that the railroads have carried very much less freight this year than usual, and the weighings will in all probability be much less than the estimates for next year.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Yes; but have not your postage receipts kept up for this present year? Is there not to be as much revenue from postage this year as there was last—as much income?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I do not know what materiality there is in that question; but I am very much afraid that the receipts for postage this year will be much less than for the last year, on account of the business depression in the country.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is that the reason the gentleman makes that statement, on account of the business depression?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I am just answering the question as it is asked; but there is another reason why I am not in favor of this House making the full appropriation as required by these different items, and that is that I think it is a great deal better, when we are uncertain about how much money it will take, to make it up in a deficiency at the end of the year than to appropriate it at the beginning of the year.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why better, when the compensation is fixed by law? What advantage is to be gained?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will state that the balances between the postmasters are settled without money. The postmasters retain the amounts that are due them for their services, and there has never been a post-office bill yet that did not appropriate enough money to meet all the demands of the Post-Office Department in this respect.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. But my friend will recollect, and correct me if I am mistaken, that when the estimates were transmitted at the beginning of this session we were right in the midst of the depression. Is it not true that the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury, in transmitting the estimates, took all that into consideration, and does not my friend know not only that they took that into consideration, but that they cut the estimate for the payment for railroad transportation and postmasters' salaries to the lowest point that they believed would be sufficient?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I do not know about that, but I think it makes no difference. I do not think any business man in the country, if he was running the Post-Office Department, would advance the money at the beginning of the year in matters of this sort, where he could settle with the postmasters, and where he could settle these other things in the way that they can be settled.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman will allow me, I should like to say I have looked through this bill and find that on most of the items, like rent for post-offices, for clerk hire, for payment of mail messengers and postal clerks, that the bill carries every dollar recommended, every dollar estimated for; but I find upon three items, namely, the payment for transportation of the mails upon the railways, postmasters' salaries, and postal-car service, that the gentleman has made the cuts which are indicated, of $2,774,000 less than the estimate.

I want to say to my friend that it is true that the law authorizes those services, although the bill did not carry one cent of appropriation; that the postmasters retain their money out of the postage as collected; that the railways can, if they choose, perform the service, and have a claim against the Government; but it is farther true that the decrease in the recommendations of this bill below the estimates are upon these three items, where the service will be performed anyhow.

Mr. DOCKERY. What three items?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. For mail transportation, postmasters' salaries, and postal-car service; and I am satisfied that just so sure as the world stands and the Government stands, this time next year, not the gentleman's committee, but the Committee on Appropriations having charge of the deficiency bill, will have to recommend appropriations for this deficiency; so that if the gentleman had given in these three instances the estimates, as he has given them substantially in all other instances, why then the close estimate of the Department would be answered by the close appropriation recommended by the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, with regard to the amount that is recommended here for railway transportation, for instance, it will be impossible for the Government to use all of that money during the next fiscal year, and I do not see why it should be necessary for us to appropriate the entire amount of the estimates in advance. I will state to the gentleman frankly that I have not made cuts on the other items, because I was unwilling to make a cut anywhere that would cripple the efficiency of the postal service of the United States.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I want to be frank with my friend, and say that in my judgment the failure to appropriate this amount of $2,744,000 in this bill will not interfere with the service in the slightest. In other words, the postmasters will retain the $1,250,000 that is not appropriated, under the law, out of the postage received by them; but when you come to square the books, you will have to make a deficiency appropriation next year for $1,250,000 for postmasters' salaries. Now, in former years, when the wicked Republicans, with a growing country and a growing service, once in a while, even in a billion dollar Congress, did not make quite as liberal appropriations as our friends upon the other side thought were desirable, you gave notice that when you got into power you were going to be honest and turn over a new leaf, and that in your annual bill providing for the service of the coming year you were going to give what the service required.

Well, now, that was a good promise, but it seems to me that the performance is not perfect; and when my genial friend from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], backed up my friend from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], comes a little later on to sum up the appropriation bills and the amount they carry for comparison with former years, why he has about $3,000,000 that is absolutely sure under the law will be expended, but not appropriated for; and I expect that my friend from Missouri, whom I see before me, will absolutely thunder in the index touching the great savings that have been effected.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will say, in reply to my friend, that when the Republican party has had power and had charge of the Post-Office appropriation bill, that it has done pretty much what our committee has done.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, I think not purposely. With a great and growing country we had great increases in the public service. It piled up month after month. Now, you say you are not to have an increase; that we are to have a continuation of the hard times; that, therefore, you plead that as a justification for cutting these appropriations. We had increases right along, and however much we might appropriate, and especially in the postal service, there was liable to be a deficiency. But even if it were true that we had been naughty, and had failed to perform our duty, I would suggest to the gentleman he should copy our virtues and not our faults.

Mr. DOCKERY. Can the gentleman give us our expenditures——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY (continuing). Can you say what are the expenditures under the items of this bill for the first six months of the present fiscal year?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No: I can not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. What was the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be now considered as closed.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I object.

Mr. KYLE. I object.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I object until some agreement has been made.

Mr. REED. There is general objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the bill is under general debate, the gentleman from North Carolina has the floor, and has occupied twenty minutes of his time.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. How much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has forty minutes remaining.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before the gentleman sits down, I desire to ask him a question.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Maine that the gentleman from North Carolina has yielded the floor, and the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will answer the gentleman from Maine, if the Chair will permit.

Mr. DINGLEY. If the Chair will pardon me a moment, before he hurries on, I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from North Carolina to the reduction of the estimates for the transportation of foreign mail. The estimates, which are close, are $1,678,000 and the appropriation is only $1,400,000. On what basis is that reduction made?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Well, sir, some of the foreign mail contracts have been canceled.

Mr. DINGLEY. Since the estimates were submitted?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Since the estimates were made.

Mr. DINGLEY. What ones since the estimates were made?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I remember two. One from New York to Colon, and another from San Francisco to Hongkong, reducing the estimated cost on these two items of $436,263.

Mr. DINGLEY. You have made a reduction of $430,000.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The reduction in the bill is from $1,678,000 to $1,400,000, but I really believe that $1,400,000 will be more than is needed.

Mr. LOUD. I do not think there are any revised estimates.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. There are no revised estimates; but since we began to consider the bill there have been these cancellations of contracts, and perhaps others.

Mr. DINGLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from California, who is somewhat familiar with this subject, if there have been any estimates submitted that would furnish any reduction?

Mr. LOUD. No estimates have been submitted carrying that proposition.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I send up an amendment which I ask to have read for information.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 4 of the bill, and lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, on page 5.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I send to the desk to have read an amendment which I propose to offer when the paragraph to which it applies is reached.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the committee will give me attention I desire to read the portion of the bill that will be stricken out if this amendment is adopted, and I say with all candor and earnestness that I believe that when this proposition is fully understood the members of this committee are not going to vote to permit the provision which I propose to strike out to remain in this bill. The provision reads as follows:

For mail messenger service, $1,285,000.

For necessary and special facilities on trunk lines from Springfield, Mass., via New York and Washington, to Atlanta and New Orleans, $196,614.22: Provided, That no part of the appropriation made by this paragraph shall be expended unless the Postmaster-General shall deem such expenditure necessary in order to promote the interest of the postal service.
